JUNIUS.

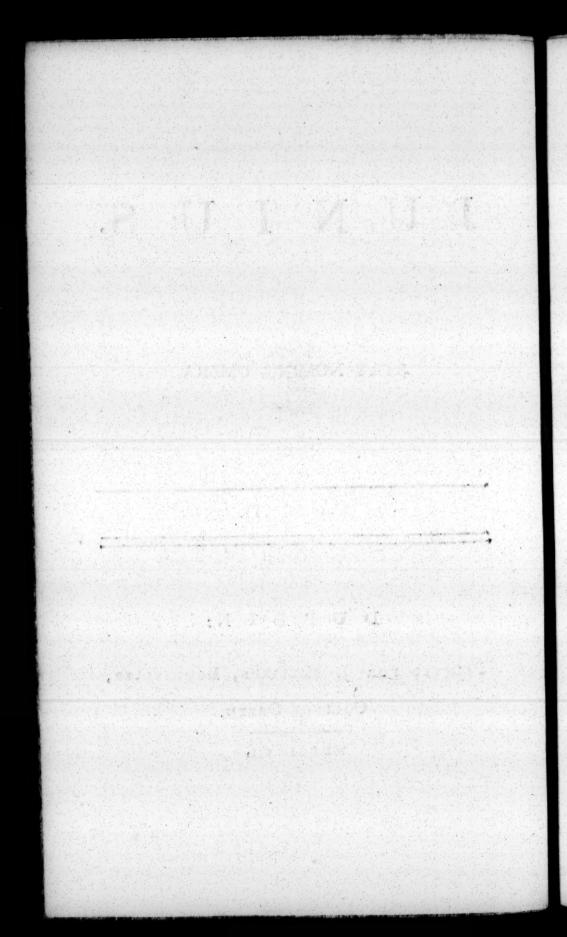

STAT NOMINIS UMBRA.

VOL. II.

DUBLIN:

PRINTED FOR J. MILLIKEN, BOOKSELLER, College-Green.

MDCCLXXII.

LETTERS

OF

JUNIUS.

LETTER XXX.

TO THE PRINTER OF THE PUBLIC AD-

SIR. 17 October, 1769. TT is not wonderful that the great cause, in which A this country is engaged, should have roused and engrossed the whole attention of the people. I rather admire the generous spirit, with which they feel and affert their interest in this important queftion, than blame them for their indifference about any other. When the constitution is openly invaded, when the first original right of the people, from which all laws derive their authority, is directly attacked, inferior grievances naturally lose their force, and are suffered to pass by without punishment or observation. The present ministry are as singularly marked by their fortune, as by their crimes. Instead of atoning for their former conduct by a wife or popular measure, they have found, in the enormity of one fact, a cover and defence for a feries of measures, which must have been fatal to any other admini-Aration. I fear we are too remiss in observing the whole of their proceedings. Struck with the principal figure, we do not sufficiently mark in what VOL. II. manner manner the canvals is filled up. Yet furely it is not a less crime, nor less fatal in its consequences, to encourage a flagrant breach of the law by a military force, than to make use of the forms of parliament to destroy the constitution. The ministry feem determined to give us a choice of difficulties, and, if possible, to perplex us with the multitude of their offences. The expedient is worthy of the Dake of But though he has preferved a gradation Gr fton. and variety in his measures, we should remember that the principle is uniform. Dictated by the same spirit, they deserve the same attention. The following fact, thor gh of the most alarming nature, has not yet been clearly stated to the public, nor have the confequences of it been sufficiently understood. Had I taken it up at an earlier period, I should have been accused of an uncandid, malignant precipitation, as if I watched for an unfair advantage against the ministry, and would not allow them a reasonable time to do their dury, They now stand without excufe. Instead of employing the leifure they have had in a ftrict examination of the offence, and punishing the offenders, they feem to have confidered that indulgence as a fecurity to them, that, with a little time and management, the whole affair might be buried in filence, and utterly forgotten.

* A MAJOR general of the army is arrested by the sheriffs officers for a considerable debt. He perfuades them to conduct him to the Tilt-yard in St. James's Park, under some pretence of business, which it imported him to settle before he was con-

He applies to a ferjeant, not immediately on duty, to affift with some of his companions in favouring his escape. He attempts it. A bustle ensues. The bailiffs claim their prisoner. * An officer of the guards, not then on duty, takes part in the affair, applies to the † lieutenant commanding the Tiltyard guard, and urges him to turn out his guard to relieve a general officer. The lieutenant declines interfering in person, but stands at a distance, and fuffers the business to be done. The officer thes upon himself to order out the guard. In a moment they are in arms, quit their guard, march, rescue the general, and drive away the heriffs officers. who, in vain represent their right to the prisoner. and the nature of the arrest. The foldiers first co duct the general into the guard-room, then efcort him to a place of fafety, with bayonets fixed. and in all the forms of military triumph. I will not enlarge upon the various circumstances which attended this atrocious proceeding. The personal injury received by the officers of the law in the execution of their duty, may perhaps be atoned for by fome private compensation. I consider nothing but the wound, which has been given to the law itself, to which no remedy has been applied, no fatisfaction made. Neither is it my defign to dwell upon the misconduct of the parties concerned, any farther than is necessary to shew the behaviour of the miniflry in its true light. I would make every compassionate allowance for the infatuation of the prifoper, the false and criminal discretion of one officer, and the madness of another. I would leave the ignorant foldiers entirely out of the question. They are certainly the least guilty, though they are the only perfons who have yet fuffered, even in the appearance of punishment. * The fact itself, however atrocious, is not the principal point to be confidered. It might have happened under a more regular government, and with guards better disciplined than ours. The main question is, in what manner have the ministry acted on this extraordinary occasion. A general officer calls upon the king's own guard, then actually on duty, to rescue him from the laws of his country; yet at this moment he is in a situation no worse, than if he had not committed an offence, equally enormous in a civil and military view.—A lieutenant upon duty designedly quits his guard, and fuffers it to be drawn out by another officer, for a purpose, he well knew (as we may collect from appearance of caution, which only makes his behaviour the more criminal) to be in the highest degree illegal. Has this gentleman been called to a court martial to answer for his conduct? No. Has it been censured? No. Has it been in any shape inquired into? No.-Another lieutenant, not upon duty, nor even in his regimentals, is daring enough to order out the king's guard, over which he had properly no command, and engages them in a violation of the laws of his country, perhaps the most fingular and extravagant that ever was attempted. -What punishment has he suffered? Literally none. Supposing he should be prosecuted at common law for the rescue, will that circumstance, from which the ministry can derive no merit, excuse or justify their suffering so flagrant a breach of military discipline to pass by unpunished, and unnoticed? Are they aware of the outrage offered to their sovereign, when his own proper guard is ordered out to stop by main sorce, the execution of his laws? What are we to conclude from so scandalous a neglect of their duty, but that they have other views, which can only be answered by securing the attachment of the guards? The minister would hardly be so cautious of offending them, if he did not mean, in due time, to call for their assistance.

^{*} Lieutenant Dodd. + Lieutenant Garth.

^{*} A few of them were confined.

WITH respect to the parties themselves, let it be observed, that these gentlemen are neither young officers, nor very young men. Had they belonged to the unfledged race of enfigns, who infest our ffreets, and dishonour our public places, it might perhaps be fufficient to fend them back to that difcipline, from which their parents, judging lightly from the maturity of their vices, had removed them too foon. In this cafe, I am forry to fee, not so much the folly of youth, as the spirit of the corps, and the connivance of government. I do not question that there are many brave and worthy officers in the regiments of guards. But confidering them as a corps, I fear, it will be found that they are neither good foldiers, nor good subjects. Far be it from me to infinuate the most distant reflection upon the army. On the contrary, I honour and esteem the profession; and if these gentlemen were better foldiers, I am fure they would be better subjects. It is not that there is an internal vice or defect in the profession itself, as regulated in this country, but that it is the spirit of this particular corps, to despise their profession, and that while they vainly assume the lead of the army, they make it matter of impertinent comparison and triumph over the bravest troops in the world (I mean our marching regiments) that they indeed stand upon higher ground, and are privileged to neglect the laborious forms of military discipline and duty. Without dwelling longer upon a most invidious subject, I shall leave it to military men, who have seen a service more active than the parade, to determine whether or no I speak truth.

How far this dangerous spirit has been encouraged by government, and to what pernicious purposes it may be applied hereafter, well deserves our most ferious consideration. I know indeed, that when this affair happened, an affectation of alarm ran through the ministry. Something must be done to fave appearances. The case was too flagrant to be passed by absolutely without notice. But how have they acted? Instead of ordering the officers concerned, (and who, strictly speaking, are alone guilty,) to be put under arrest, and brought to trial, they would have it understood, that they did their duty completely, in confining a fericant and four private foldiers, until they should be demanded by the civil power; fo that while the officers, who ordered or permitted the thing to be done, escape without censure, the poor men who obeyed those orders, who in a military view are no way responsible for what they did, and who for that reason have been discharged by the civil magistrates, are the only objects whom the ministry have thought proper to expose to punishment. They did not venture to bring even these men to a court martial, because they knew their evidence would be fatal to some persons, whom they were determined to protect. Otherwise, I doubt not, the lives of these unhappy, friendless soldiers would long since have been sacrificed without scruple to the security of their guilty officers.

I HAVE been accused of endeavouring to enslame the passions of the people.—Let me now appeal to their understanding. If there be any tool of administration during enough to deny these sacts, or shameless enough to defend the conduct of the ministry, let him come forward. I care not under what title he appears. He shall find me ready to maintain the truth of my narrative, and the justice of my observations upon it, at the hazard of my utmost credit with the public.

UNDER the most arbitrary governments, the common administration of justice is suffered to take its course. The subject, though robbed of his share in the legislature, is still protected by the laws. The political freedom of the English constitution was once the pride and honour of an Englishman. The civil equality of the laws preserved the property, and defended the safety of the subject. Are these glorious privileges the birthright of the people, or are we only tenants at the will of the ministry?—But that I know there is a spirit of refistance in the hearts of my countrymen, that they value life, not by its conveniences, but by the independence and dignity of their condition, I should,

at this moment, appeal only to their discretion. I should persuade them to banish from their minds all memory of what we were; I should tell them this is not a time to remember that we were Englishmen; and give it as my last advice, to make some early agreement with the minister, that since it has pleased him to rob us of those political rights, which once distinguished the inhabitants of a country, where honour was happiness, he would leave us at least the humble, obedient security of citizens, and graciously condescend to protect us in our submission.

JUNIUS.

LETTER XXXI.

TO THE PRINTER OF THE PUBLIC AD-VERTISER.

14 Nov. 1769. SIR. THE variety of remarks, which have been I made upon the last letter of Junius, and my own opinion of the Writer, who, whatever may be his faults, is certainly not a weak man, have induced me to examine, with fome attention, the fubject of that letter. I could not perfuade myfelf that, while he had plenty of important materials, he would have taken up a light or trifling occasion to attack the Ministry; much less could I conceive that it was his intention to ruin the officers concerned in the rescue of general Gansel, or to injure the general himself. These are little objects, and can no way contribute to the great purpofes he feems to have in view by addressing himself to the public .--

lic .- Without confidering the ornamented stile he has adopted, I determined to look farther into the matter, before I decided upon the merits of his letter. The first slep I took was to enquire into the truth of the facts; for if these were either false or misrepresented, the most artful exertion of his understanding, in reasoning upon them, would only be a difgrace to him .- Now, Sir, I have found every circumstance stated by Junius to be literally true. General Gansel persuaded the bailiffs to conduct him to the parade, and certainly folicited a Corporal and other Soldiers to affift him in making his escape. Captain Dodd did certainly apply to Captain Garth for the assistance of his guard. Captain Garth declined appearing himself, but stood aloof, while the other took upon him to order out the King's guard, and by main force refeued the General. It is also strictly true, that the General was escorted by a file of musqueteers to a place of fecurity .- These are folia, Mr. Woodfall, which I promife year no gentleman in the guards will deny. If all or any of them are false, why are they not contradicted by the parties themselves? However fecure against military censure, they have yet a character to lofe, and furely, if they are innocent, it is not beneath them to pay some attention to the opinion of the public.

THE force of funius's Observations upon these sales cannot be better marked, than by stating and resulting the objections which have been made to them. One writer says, "Admitting the officers have offended, they are punishable at common sales, and will you have a British subject punished twice for the same offence?"-I answer that they have committed two offences, both very enormous, and violated two laws. The refcue is one offence, the flagrant breach of discipline another, and hitherto it does not appear that they have been punished, or even centured for either. Another gentleman lays much stress upon the calamity of the case, and, instead of disproving facts, appeals at once to the compassion of the public. This idea, as well as the infinuation that depriving the parties of their commissions would be an injury to their creditors, can only refer to General Ganiel. The other officers are in no diffress, therefore, have no claim to compassion, nor does it appear, that their creditors, if they have any, are more likely to be fatisfied by their continuing in the guards. But this fort of plea will not hold in any shape. Compassion to an offender, who has grossly violated the laws, is in effect a cruelty to the peaceable subject who has observed them; and, even admitting the force of any alleviating circumstances, it is nevertheless true, that, in this instance, the royal compassion has interposed too soon. The legal and proper mercy of a King of England may remit the punishment, but ought not to stop the trial.

Besides these particular objections, there has been a cry raised against Junius for his malice and injustice in attacking the ministry upon an event, which they could neither hinder nor foresee. This, I must affirm, is a false representation of his argument. He lays no stress upon the event itself, as a ground of accusation against the ministry, but dwells entirely upon their subsequent conduct. He does

does not fay that they are answerable for the offence. but for the scandalous neglect of their duty, in suffering an offence, fo flagrant, to pass by without notice or inquiry. Supposing them ever so regardless of what they owe to the public, and as indifferent about the opinion as they are about the interests of their country, what answer, as officers of the crown, will they give to Junius, when he asks them, Are they aware of the outrage offered to their Sovereign, when his own proper guard is ordered out to Rop, by main force, the execution of his laws? And when we fee a ministry giving such a strange unaccountable protection to the officers of the guards, is it unfair to suspect, that they have some fecret and unwarrantable motives for their conduct? If they feel themselves injured by such a suspicion. why do they not immediately clear themselves from it, by doing their Auty? For the honour of the guards, I cannot help expressing another suspicion, that, if the commanding officer had not received a fecret injunction to the contrary, he would, in the ordinary courfe of his bufiness, have applied for a court martial to try the two fubalterns; the one for quitting his guard;—the other for taking upon him the command of the guard, and employing it in the manner he did. I do not mean to enter into or defend the feverity, with which Junius treats the guards. On the contrary, I will suppose, for a moment, that they deserve a very different character. If this be true, in what light will they confider the conduct of the two fubalterns, but as a general reproach and difgrace to the whole corps? And will they not wish to see them censured in a military military way, if it were only for the credit and difcipline of the Regiment?

UPON the whole, Sir, the Ministry seem to me to have taken a very improper advantage of the good-nature of the public, whose humanity, they found, confidered nothing in this affair but the diftress of General Gansel. They would persuade us that it was only a common rescue by a few disorderly foldiers, and not the formal deliberate act of the king's guard, headed by an officer, and the public has fallen into the deception. I think, therefore, we are obliged to Junius for the care he has taken to inquire into the facts, and for the just commentary with which he has given them to the world. -For my own part, I am as unwilling as any man to load the unfortunate; but, really, Sir, the precedent, with respect to the guards, is of a most important nature, and alarming enough (confidering the confequences with which it may be attended) to deferve a parliamentary inquiry: when the guards are daring enough, not only to violate their own discipline, but publicly and with the most atrocious violence to stop the execution of the laws, and when such extraordinary offences pass with impunity, believe me, Sir, the precedent strikes deep. PHILO JUNIUS.

LETTER XXXII.

THE PUBLIC THE PRINTER VERTISER.

15 Nov. 1769. SIR.

T ADMIT the claim of a gentleman, who publishes in the Gazetteer under the name of Modestus. He has fome right to expect an answer from me; though, I think, not so much from the merit or importance of his objections, as from my own voluntary engagement. I had a reason for not taking notice of him fooner, which, as he is a candid person, I believe he will think fufficient. In my first letter, I took for granted, for the time which had elapsed, that there was no intention to cenfure, nor even to try the persons concerned in the rescue of General Ganfel; but Modestus having fince either affirmed, or strongly infinuated, that the offenders might still be brought to a legal trial, any attempt to prejudice the minds of the jury would be highly improper.

A MAN, more hostile to the ministry than I am, would not so often remind them of their duty. If the Duke of Grafton will not perform the duty of his station, why is he minister?—I will not descend to a scurrilous altercation with any man: but this is a subject too important to be passed over with filent indifference. If the gentlemen, whose conduct is in question, are not brought to a trial, the Duke of Grafton shall hear from me again.

THE motives on which I am supposed to have taken up this cause, are of little importance, compared with the facts themselves, and the observations I have made upon them. Without a vain profession of integrity, which, in these times, might justly be suspected, I shall shew myself in effect a friend to the interests of my countrymen, and leave it to them to determine, whether I am moved by a perfonal malevolence to three private gentlemen, or merely a hope of perplexing the ministy, or whether I am animated by a just and honourable purpose of obtaining a satisfaction to the laws of this country, equal, if possible, to the violation they have suffered. JUNIUS.

LETTER XXXIII.

TO HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF GRAFTON.

MY LORD.

29 Nov. 1769.

HOUGH my opinion of your Grace's integrity was but little affected by the coyness with which you received Mr. Vaughan's proposals, I confess I give you some credit for your discretion. You had a fair opportunity of displaying a certain delicacy, of which you had not been suspected; and you were in the right to make use of it. By laying in a moderate stock of reputation, you undoubtedly meant to provide for the future necessities of your character, that with an honourable refistance upon record, you might fafely indulge your genius, and yield to a favourite inclination with fecurity. But you have discovered your purposes too foon; and, instead of the modest reserve of virtue, have shewn us the termagant chastity of a prude, who gratifies ber passions with distinction, and prosecutes one lover for a rape, while she solicits the lewd embraces of another. YOUR

Your cheek turns pale; for a guilty conscience tells you, you are undone.-Come forward, thou virtuous minister, and tell the world by what interest Mr. Hine has been recommended to fo extraordinary a mark of his Majesty's favour; what was the price of the patent he has bought, and to what honourable purpose the money has been applied. Nothing less than many thousands could pay colonel Burgoyne's expences at Preston. Do you dare to profecute fuch a creature as. Vaughan, while you are basely setting up the Royal Patronage to auction? Do you dare to complain of an attack upon your own honour, while you are felling the favours of the crown, to raise a fund for corrupting the morals of the people? And, do you think it possible fuch enormities should escape without impeachment? It is indeed highly your interest to maintain the present house of commons. Having fold the nation to you in grofs, they will undoubtedly proteet you in the detail; for while they patronize your crimes, they feel for their own.

JUNIUS.

LETTER XXXIV.

TO HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF GRAFTON.

MY LORD, 12 Dec. 1769.

I FIND with some surprise, that you are not supported as you deserve. Your most determined advocates have scruples about them, which you are unacquainted with; and, though there be nothing too hazardous for your Grace to engage in, there are some things too infamous for the vilest proslitute profitute of a news-paper to defend*. In what other manner shall we account for the profound, submissive silence, which you and your friends have observed upon a charge, which called immediately for the clearest refutation, and would have justified the feverest measures of resentment? I did not atrempt to blast your character by an indirect, ambiguous infinuation, but candidly stated to you a plain fact, which struck directly at the integrity of a privy counsellor, of a first commissioner of the treasury, and of a leading minister, who is supposed to enjoy the first share in his Majesty's confidence t. In every one of these capacities I employed the most moderate terms to charge you with treachery to your Sovereign, and breach of trust in your office. I accused you of having fold a patent place in the collection of the customs at Exeter, to one Mr. Hine, who, unable or unwilling to depofit the whole purchase-money himself, raised part of it by contribution, and has now a certain Doctor Brooke quartered upon the falary for one hundred pounds a year.-No fale by the candle was ever conducted with greater formality.-I affirm that the price, at which the place was knocked down (and which, I have good reason to think, was not less than three thousand five hundred pounds) was, with your connivance and confent, paid to Colonel Burgoyne, to reward him, I prefume, for the de-

4 And by the fame means preferves it to this hour.

^{*} From the publication of the preceding to this date, not one wood was faid in defence of the infamous Duke of Grafton. But vice and impudence foon recovered themselves, and the sale of the toyal favour was openly avowed and defended. We acknowledge the piety of St. James's; but what is become of bis morality?

burse him, perhaps, for the fine of one thousand pounds, which, for that very deportment, the court of King's Bench thought proper to set upon him.—It is not often that the chief justice and the prime minister are so strangely at variance in their opinions of men and things.

I THANK God there is not in human nature a degree of impudence daring enough to deny the charge I have fixed upon you. * Your courteous fecretary, your confidential architect +, are filent as the grave. Even Mr. Rigby's countenance fails him. He violates his fecond nature, and blushes whenever he speaks of you.-Perhaps the noble Colonel himself will relieve you. No man is more tender of his reputation. He is not only nice, but perfectly fore in every thing that touches his honour. If any man, for example, were to accuse him of taking his stand at a gaming-table, and watching, with the foberest attention, for a fair opportunity of engaging a drunken young nobleman at piquet, he would undoubtedly confider it as an infamous afpersion upon his character, and refent it like a man of honour. - Acquitting him therefore of drawing a regular and splendid subsistence from any unworthy practices, either in his own house or elsewhere, let me ask your Grace, for what military merits you have been pleased to reward him with military government? He had a regiment of dragoons, which one would imagine, was at least an equivalent for any services he ever performed. Besides, he is but a young officer confidering his preferment, and, except in his activity at Preston, not very conspicuous in his profession. But it feems, the fale of a civil employment was not fufficient, and military governments, which were intended for the support of worn-out veterans, must be thrown into the scale, to defray the extenfive bribery of a contested election. Are these the steps you take to secure to your Sovereign the attachment of his army? With what countenance dare you appear in the royal prefence, branded as you are with the infamy of a notorious breach of trust? With what countenance can you take your feat at the treasury-board or in council, when you feel that every circulating whilper is at your expence alone, and flabs you to the heart? Have you a fingle friend in parliament fo shameless, so thoroughly abandoned, as to undertake your defence? You know, my Lord, that there is not a man in either house, whose character, however flagitious, would not be ruined by mixing his reputation with yours; and does not your heart inform you, that you are degraded below the condition of a man, when you are obliged to hear these infults with fubmission, and even to thank me for my moderation?

[&]quot; Tommy Bradshaw.

⁺ Mr. Taylor. He and George Rofe, (the Scotch agent and worthy confidant of Lord Mansfield) managed the business.

We are told, by tis highest judicial authority, that Mr. Vaughan's offer to purchase the reversion of a patent in Jamaica (which he was otherwise sufficiently entitled to) amounted to a high misdemeanour. Be it so: and if he deserves it, let him be punished. But the learned judge might have had a fairer a fairer opportunity of displaying the powers of his eloquence. Having delivered himself with so much energy upon the criminal nature, and dangerous consequences of any attempt to corrupt a man in your Grace's station, what would he have said to the minister himself, to that very privy counsellor, to that first commissioner of the treasury, who does not wait for, but impatiently solicits the touch of corruption; who employs the meanest of his creatures in these honourable services, and, forgetting the genius and sidelity of his secretary, descends to apply to his house-builder for assistance?

This affair, my Lord, will do infinite credit to government, if, to clear your character, you should think proper to bring it into the house of Lords, or into the court of King's Bench.—But, my Lord, you dare not do either.

JUNIUS.

LET-

A little before the publication of this and the preceding letter, the chaste Duke of Grafton had commenced a profecution against Mr. Samuel Vaughan, for endeavouring to corrupt his integrity by an offer of five thousand pounds for a patent place in Jamaica. A rule to flew cause, why an information should not be exhibited against Vaughan for certain misdemeanors, being granted by the Court of King's Bench, the matter was folemnly argued on the 27. of November, 1769, and, by the unanimous opinion of the four judges, the rule was made alfolute. The pleadings and speeches were accurately taken in mort-hand and published. The whole of Lord Mansfield's speech, and particularly the following extracts from it, deferve the reader's attention. "A practice of the kind complained of here is certainly diffeonourable and feandalous.—If a man, " tlanding under the relation of an officer under the King, or of a " person in whom the King puts confidence, or of a minister, takes " money for the use of that confidence the King puts in him, he " basely becrays the King, -he basely betrays his crutt .- If the King sa fold B 2

LETTER XXXV.

TO THE PRINTER OF THE PUBLIC AD-VERTISER.

19 December, 1769.

milled.

When the complaints of a brave and powerful people are observed to encrease in proportion to the wrongs they have suffered; when, instead of sinking into submission, they are roused to resistance, the time will soon arrive at which every inferior consideration must yield to the security of the Sovereign, and to the general safety of the state. There is a moment of difficulty and danger, at which stattery and salsehood can no longer deceive, and simplicity itself can no longer be

" fold the office, it would be acting contrary to the trust the confli-"tution reposed in him. The constitution does not intend the " crown should fell those offices, to raise a revenue out of them .- I it possible to helitare, whether this would not be criminal in the Duke of Grafton; - contrary to his duty as a privy counfellor; --46 contrary to his duty as a minister-contrary to his duty as a sub-" ject .- His advice should be free according to his judgment ;- It is the duty of his office; -he has fworn to it." -- Notwithstanding all this, the chaste Duke of Grafton certainly fold a patent place to Mr. Hine for three thousand five hundred pounds; and, for to doing, is now Lord Privy Seal to the chafte George, with whose piety we are perpetually deafened. If the house of commons had done their duty. and impeached the black Duke for this most infamous breach of tiut. how woefully must poor, honest Mansheld have been puzzled! His embarassment would have afforded the most ridiculous scene, that ever was exhibited. To fave the worthy judge from this perplexity. and the no less worthy Duke from impeachment, the profecution against Vaughon was, immediately dropped upon my discovery and publication of the Duke's treachery. The fuffering this charge to pale, without any inquiry, fixes shameless prostitution upon the face of the house of commons, more strongly than even the Middlesex election .-- Yet the licentiousness of the press is complained of !

missed. Let us suppose it arrived. Let us suppose a gracious, well-intentioned prince, made fensible at last of the great duty he owes to his people, and of his own difgraceful fituation; that he looks round him for affiftance, and afks for no advice, but how to gratify the wishes, and secure the happiness of his subjects. In these circumstances, it may be matter of curious SPECULA-TION to consider, if an honest man were permitted to approach a King, in what terms he would address himself to his Sovereign. Let it be imagined, no matter how improbable, that the first prejudice against his character is removed, that the ceremonious difficulties of an audience are furmounted, that he feels himfelf animated by the pureft and most honourable affections to his King and country, and that the great person, whom he addresses, has spirit enough to bid him fpeak freely, and understanding enough to listen to him with attention. Unacquainted with the vain impertinence of forms, he would deliver his fentiments with dignity and firmness, but not without respect.

SIR,

the cause of every reproach and distress, which has attended your government, that you should never have been acquainted with the language of truth, until you heard it in the complaints of your people. It is not, however, too late to correct the error of your education. We are still inclined to make an indulgent allowance for the pernicious lesfons you received in your youth, and to form the most sanguine hopes from the natural benevolence of your disposition*. We are far from thinking you capable of a direct, deliberate purpose to invade those original rights of your subjects, on which all their civil and political liberties depend. Had it been possible for us to entertain a suspicion so dishonourable to your character, we should long since have adopted a style of remonstrance very distant from the humility of complaint. The doctrince inculcated by our laws, That the king can do no wrong, is admitted without reluctance. We separate the amiable, good-natured prince from the folly and treachery of his servants, and the private virtues of the man from the vices of his government. Were

^{*} The plan of tutelage and future dominion over the heir appasent, laid many years ago at Carleton-house between the Princess Dowager and her favourite the Earl of Bute, was as grofs and palpable, as that, which was concerted between Anne of Austria and Cardinal Mazarin, to govern Lewis the Pourteenth, and in effect to prolong his minority until the end of their lives. That prince had flrong matural parts, and used frequently to blush for his own ignorance and want of education, which had been wilfully neglected by his mother and her minion. A little experience however foon shewed him how thamefully he had been treated, and for what infamous purposes be had been kept in ignorance. Our great Edward too, at an early period, had fense enough to understand the nature of the connection between his abandoned mother, and the deteffed Mortimer. But, fince that time, human nature, we may observe, is greatly altered for the better. Dowagers may be chafte, and minions may be honeft. When it was proposed to settle the present King's houshold as Prince of Wales, it is well known that the Earl of Bute was forced into it, in direct contradiction to the late king's inclination. That was the falient point, from which all the mischiefs and disgraces of the present reign, took life and motion. From that moment, Lord Bute never fuffered the Prince of Wales to be an inflant out of his fight .- We need look no farther.

it not for this just distinction, I know not whether your Majesty's condition, or that of the English nation, would deserve most to be lamented. I would prepare your mind for a favourable reception of truth, by removing every painful, offensive idea of personal reproach. Your subjects, Sir, wish for nothing but that, as they are reasonable and affectionate enough to separate your person from your government, so you, in your turn, should distinguish between the conduct, which becomes the permanent dignity of a King, and that which serves only to promote the temporary interest and miserable ambition of a minister.

You ascended the throne with a declared, and, I doubt not, a fincere refolution of giving universal satisfaction to your subjects. You found them pleased with the novelty of a young prince, whose countenance promifed even more than his words. and loyal to you not only from principle, but paffion. It was not a cold profession of allegiance to the first magistrate, but a partial, animated attachment to a favourite prince, the native of their country. They did not wait to examine your conduct, nor to be determined by experience, but gave you a generous credit for the future bleffings of your reign, and paid you in advance the dearest tribute of their affections. Such, Sir, was once the disposition of a people, who now furround your throne with reproaches and complaints. Do justice to yourself. Banish from your mind those unworthy opinions, with which fome interested persons have laboured to possess you. Distrust the men, who tell you that the English are naturally light and inconstant;—that they complain without a cause. Withdraw your considence equally from all parties: from ministers, savourites, and relations; and let there be one moment in your life, in which you have consulted your own understanding.

WHEN you affectedly renounced the name of Englishman, believe me, Sir, you were persuaded to pay a very ill-judged compliment to one part of your subjects, at the expence of another. While the natives of Scotland are not in actual rebellion, they are undoubtedly intitled to protection; nor do I mean to condemn the policy of giving some encouragement to the novelty of their affections for the house of Hanover. I am ready to hope for every thing from their new-born zeal, and from the future steadiness of their allegiance. But hitherto they have no claim to your favour. To honour them with a determined predilection and confidence, in exclusion of your English subjects, who placed your family, and in spite of treachery and rebellion, have supported it upon the throne, is a mistake too gross, even for the unsuspected generofity of youth. In this error we see a capital violation of the most obvious rules of policy and prudence. We trace it, however, to an original bias in your education, and are ready to allow for your inexperience.

To the same early influence we attribute it, that you have descended to take a share not only in the narrow views and interests of particular persons, but in the satal malignity of their passions. Atyour accession to the throne, the whole system of government was altered, not from wisdom or deliberation, but because it had been adopted by your predecessor. A little personal motive of pique and refentment was sufficient to remove the ablest servants of the crown *: but it is not in this country. Sir, that fuch men can be dishonoured by the frowns of a King. They were dismissed, but could not be difgraced. Without entering into a minuter discussion of the merits of the peace, we may observe, in the imprudent hurry with which the first overtures from France were accepted, in the conduct of the negotiation, and terms of the treaty, the strongest marks of that precipitate spirit of concession, with which a certain part of your fubjects have been at all times ready to purchase a peace with the natural enemies of this country. On your part we are fatisfied that every thing was honourable and fincere, and if England was fold to France, we doubt not that your Majesty was equally betrayed. The conditions of the peace were matter of grief and furprise to your subjects, but not the immediate cause of their present discontent.

beration,

HITHERTO, Sir, you had been facrificed to the prejudices and passions of others. With what firmness will you bear the mention of your own?

A MAN, not very honourably distinguished in the world, commences a formal attack upon your favourite, considering nothing, but how he might best expose his person and principles to detestation, and the national character of his countrymen to contempt

^{*} One of the first acts of the present reign was to distrais Mr. Legge, because he had some years before refused to yield his interest in Hampshire to a Scotchman recommended by Lord Bute. This was the reason publicly assigned by his Lordship.

contempt. The natives of that country, Sir, are as much diffinguished by a peculiar character, as by your Majesty's favour. Like another chosen people, they have been conducted into the land of plenty, where they find themselves effectually marked, and divided from mankind. There is hardly a period, at which the most irregular character may not be redeemed. The mistakes of one fex find a retreat in patriotifm; those of the other in devotion. Mr. Wilkes brought with him into politics the fame liberal fentiments, by which his private conduct had been directed, and feemed to think, that, as there are few excelles, in which an English gentleman may not be permitted to indulge, the same latitude was allowed him in the choice of his political principles, and in the spirit of maintaining them .- I mean to state, not entirely to defend his conduct. In the earnestness of his zeal. he suffered some unwarrantable infinuations to escape him. He said more than moderate men would justify; but not enough to entitle him to the honour of your Majesty's personal resentment. The rays of Royal indignation, collected upon him, ferved only to illuminate, and could not confume. Animated by the favour of the people on one fide, and heated by perfecution on the other, his views and fentiments changed with his fituation. Hardly ferious at first, he is now an enthusiast. The coldeft bodies warm with opposition, the hardest sparkle in collision. There is a holy mistaken zeal in politics as well as religion. By perfuading others, we convince ourselves. The passions are engaged, and create a maternal affection in the mind, which forces forces us to love the cause, for which we suffer .-Is this a contention worthy of a King? Are you not fensible how much the meanness of the cause gives an air of ridicule to the ferious difficulties into which you have been betrayed? the destruction of one man has been now, for many years, the fole object of your government, and if there can be any thing still more disgraceful, we have seen, for such an object, the utmost influence of the executive power, and every ministerial artifice exerted without fuccefs. Nor can you ever fucceed, unlefs he should be imprudent enough to forfeit the protection of those laws, to which you owe your crown. or unless your ministers should perfuade you to make it a question of force alone, and try the whole strength of government in opposition to the people. The lessons he has received from experience, will probably guard him from fuch excess of folly; and in your Majesty's virtues we find an unquestionable affurance that no illegal violence will be attempted.

FAR from suspecting you of so horrible a design, we would attribute the continued violation of the laws, and even this last enormous attack upon the vital principles of the constitution, to an ill-advised, unworthy, personal resentment. From one false step you have been betrayed into another, and as the cause was unworthy of you, your ministers were determined that the prudence of the execution should correspond with the wisdom and dignity of the design. They have reduced you to the necessity of choosing out of a variety of difficulties;—to a situation so unhappy, that you can neither do wrong without ruin, nor right without assistant.

These worthy servants have undoubtedly given you many singular proofs of their abilities. Not contented with making Mr. Wilkes a man of importance, they have judiciously transferred the question, from the rights and interests of one mar, to the most important rights and interests of the people, and forced your subjects, from wishing well to the cause of an individual, to unite with him in their own. Let them proceed as they have begun, and your majesty need not doubt that the catastrophe will do no dishonour to the conduct of the piece.

THE circumstances to which you are reduced, will not admit of a compromise with the English nation. Undecifive, qualifying measures will difgrace your government still more than open violence, and, without fatisfying the people, will excite their contempt. They have too much understanding and fririt to accept of an indirect fatisfaction for a direct injury. Nothing less than a repeal, as formal as the resolution itself, can heal the wound, which has been given to the constitution, nor will any thing less be accepted. I can readily believe that there is an influence sufficient to recal that permicious vote. The house of commons undoubtedly consider their duty to the crown as paramount to all other obligations. To us they are only indebted for an accidental existence, and have justly transferred their gratitude from their parents to their benefactors; - from thole, who gave them birth, to the minister, from whose benevolence they derive the comforts and pleafures of their political life; -who has taken the tenderest care of their infancy, and relieves their necessities without offending their delicacy. But, if it were possible for their integrity to be degraded to a condition so vile and abject, that, compared with it, the present estimation they stand in is a state of honour and respect, consider, Sir, in what manner you will afterwards proceed. Can you conceive that the people of this country will long fubmit to be governed by fo flexible a house of commons! It is not in the nature of human fociety, that any form of government, in fuch circumstances, can long be preferved. In ours, the general contempt of the people is as fatal as their detestation. Such, I am perfunded, would be the necessary effect of any base concession made by the present house of commons, and, as a qualifying measure would not be accepted, it remains for you to decide whether you will, at any hazard, support a fet of men, who have reduced you to this unhappy dilemma, or whether you will gratify the united wishes of the whole people of England by diffolving the parliament.

Taking it for granted, as I do very fincerely, that you have personally no design against the constitution, nor any view inconsistent with the good of your subjects, I think you cannot hesitate long upon the choice, which it equally concerns your interest, and your honour to adopt. On one side, you hazard the affections of all your English subjects; you relinquish every hope of repose to yourself, and you endanger the establishment of your family for ever. All this you venture for no object whatsoever, or for such an object, as it would be an affront to you to name. Men of sense will examine your conduct with suspicion; while those who are incapable of comprehending to what degree they are injured, afflict you with clamours equally infolent and unmeaning. Supposing it possible that no fatal struggle should ensue, you determine at once to be unhappy, without the hope of a compensation either from interest or ambition. It an English King be hated or despised, he must be unhappy; and this perhaps is the only political truth, which he ought to be convinced of without experiment. But if the English people should no longer confine their refentment to a submissive representation of their wrongs: if, following the glorious example of their ancestors, they should no longer appeal to the creature of the constitution, but to that high Being, who gave them the rights of humanity, whose gifts it were facrilege to furrender, let me ask you, Sir, upon what part of your subjects you would rely for affistance?

THE people of Ireland have been uniformly plundered and oppressed. In return, they give you every day fresh marks of their resentment. They despise the miserable governor you have sent them *, because he is the creature of Lord Bute; nor is it from any natural confusion in their ideas, that they are so ready to consound the original of a king with the difgraceful reprefentation of him.

THE distance of the Colonies would make it impossible for them to take an active concern in your affairs, if they were as well affected to your government as they once pretended to be to your person. They were ready enough to distinguish between you and your ministers. They complained of an act of the legislature, but traced the origin of it no higher than the fervants of the crown: They pleafed themfelves with the hope that their Sovereign, if not favourable to their caufe, at least was impartial. The decifive, perfonal part you took against them, has effectually banished that first distinction from their minds *. They confider you as united with your fervants against America, and know how to distinguish the Sovereign and a venal parliament on one fide, from the real fentiments of the English people on the other. Looking forward to independence, they might possibly receive you for their king; but, if ever you retire to America, be affured they will give you fuch a covenant to digeft, as the prefbytery of Scotland would have been ashamed to offer to Charles the fecond. They left their native land in fearch of freedom, and found it in a defart. Divided as they are into a thousand forms of policy and religion, there is one point in which they all agree: -they equally detest the pageantry of a king, and the fupercilious hypocrify of a bishop.

^{*} Viscount Townshend, sent over on the plan of being resident governor. The history of his ridiculous administration shall not be lost to the public

It is not then from the alienated affections of Ireland or America, that you can reasonably look for assistence; still less from the people of England, who are actually contending for their rights, and in this great question are parties against you. You are not however, destitute of every appearance of support:

^{*} In the King's speech of 8 November, 1768, it was declared, "That the spirit of saction had broke out a fresh in some of the colo-

is nies, and, in one of them, proceeded to acts of violence and relifis tance to the execution of the laws;—that Bolton was in a state of

[&]quot;disobedience to all law and government, and had proceeded to meatures subversive of the constitution, and attended with circumstan-

[&]quot; ces, that manifelled a diffesition to throw off their dependance on

[&]quot; Creat Britain,"

You have all the Jacobites, Non-jurors, Roman Catholics, and Tories of this country, and all Scotland without exception. Confidering from what family vou are descended, the choice of your friends has been fingularly directed; and truly, Sir, if you had not loft the whig interest of England, I should admire your dexterity in turning the hearts of your enemies. Is it possible for you to place any confidence in men, who, before they are faithful to you, must renounce every opinion, and betray every principle, both in church and state, which they inherit from their ancestors, and are confirmed in by their education? whose numbers are so inconsiderable, that they have long fince been obliged to give up the principles and language which diffinguish them as a party, and to fight under the banners of their enemies? Their zeal begins with hypocrify, and must conclude in treachery. At first they deceive; at last they betray.

As to the Scotch, I must suppose your heart and understanding so biassed, from your earliest infancy, in their favour, that nothing less than your own missortunes can undeceive you. You will not accept of the uniform experience of your ancestors; and when once a man is determined to believe, the very absurdity of the doctrine confirms him in his saith. A bigoted understanding can draw a proof of attachment to the house of Hanover from a notorious zeal for the house of Stuart, and find an earnest of suture loyalty in former rebellions. Appearances are however in their favour; so strongly indeed, that one would think they had forgotten that you are their lawful King, and had mistaken

you for a pretender to the crown. Let it be admitted then that the Scotch are as fincere in their present professions, as if you were in reality not an Englishman, but a Briton of the North. You would not be the first prince, of their native country, against whom they have rebelled, nor the first whom they have basely betrayed. Have you forgotten, Sir, or has your favourite concealed from you that part of our history, when the unhappy Charles, (and he too had private virtues) fled from the open, avowed indignation of his English subjects, and furrendered himfelf at discretion to the good faith of his own countrymen. Without looking for support in their affections as subjects, he applied only to their honour as gentlemen, for protection. They received him as they would your Majesty, with bows, and smiles, and falsehood, and kept him until they had fettled their bargain with the English parliament; then basely sold their native king to the vengeance of his enemies. This, Sir, was not the act of a few traitors, but the deliberate treachery of a Scotch parliament, reprefenting the nation. A wife prince might draw from it two lessons of equal utility to himself. On one fide he might learn to dread the undifguised refentment of a generous people, who dare openly affert their rights, and who, in a just cause are ready to meet their Sovereign in the field. On the other fide, he would be taught to apprehend fomething far more formidable; -a fawning treachery, against which no prudence can guard, no courage can defend. The infidious smile upon the cheek would warn him of the canker in the heart.

FROM the uses, to which one part of the army has been too frequently applied, you have some reason to expect, that there are no services they would refule. Here too we trace the partiality of your understanding. You take the sense of the army from the conduct of the guards, with the same justice with which you collect the fense of the people from the reprefentations of the ministry. Your marching regiments, Sir, will not make the guards their example either as foldiers or subjects. feel and refent, as they ought to do, that invariable, undistinguished favour with which the guards are treated; * while those gallant troops, by whom every hazardous, every laborious fervice is performed, are left to perish in garrisons abroad, or pine in quarters at home, neglected and forgotten. If they had no fense of the great original duty they owe their country, their refentment would operate like patriotism, and leave your cause to be defended by those, to whom you have lavished the rewards and honours of their profession. The Pratorian Bands, enervated and debauched as they were, had ftill ftrength enough to awe the Roman populace: but when the diffant legions took the alarm,

The number of commissioned officers in the guards are to the marching regiments as one to eleven;—the number of regiments given to the guards, compared with those given to the line, is about three to one, at a moderate computation; consequently the partiality in favour of the guards is as thirty-three to one.—So much for the officers.—The private men have sour-pence a day to substitute on; and five hundred lashes, if they desert. Under this punishment, they frequently expire. With these encouragements, it is supposed, they may be depended upon, whenever a certain person thinks it necessary to butcher his fellow subjects.

alarm, they marched to Rome, and gave away the empire.

On this fide then, which ever way you turn your eyes, you see nothing but perplexity and distress. You may determine to support the very ministry who have reduced your affairs to this deplorable situation: you may shelter yourself under the forms of a parliament, and set your people at desiance. But be assured, Sir, that such a resolution would be as imprudent as it would be odious. If it did not immediately shake your establishment, it would rob you of your peace of mind for ever.

On the other, how different is the prospect! How easy, how fase and honourable is the path before you! The English nation declare they are grossly injured by their representatives, and solicit your Majesty to exert your lawful prerogative, and give them an opportunity of recalling a truft, which, they find, has been scandalously abused. You are not to be told that the power of the boufe of commons is not original, but delegated to them for the welfare of the people, from whom they received it. A question of right arises between the constituent and the representative body. By what authority shall it be decided? Will your Majesty interfere in a question in which you have properly no immediate concern.—It would be a step equally odious and unnecessary. Shall the lords be called upon to determine the rights and privileges of the commons? -They cannot do it without a flagrant breach of the constitution. Or will you refer it to the judges?—They have often told your ancestors, that the law of parliament is above them. What party then remains, but to leave it to the people to determine for themselves? They alone are injured; and since there is no superior power, to which the cause can be referred, they alone ought to determine.

I Do not mean to perplex you with a tedious argument upon a subject already so discussed, that inipiration could hardly throw a new light upon it. There are, however, two points of view, in which it particularly imports your Majesty to consider, the late proceedings of the house of commons. By depriving a fubject of his birthright, they have attributed to their own vote an authority equal to an act of the whole legislature; and, though perhaps not with the fame motives, have strictly followed the example of the long parliament, which first declared the regal office useless, and soon after with as little ceremony, dissolved the house of lords. The fame pretended power, which robs an English fubject of his birth-right, may rob an English King of his crown. In another view, the resolution of the house of commons, apparently not so dangerous to your Majefty, is still more alarming to your people. Not contented with divefting one man of his right, they have arbitrarily conveyed that right to another. They have fet afide a return as illegat, without daring to cenfure those officers, who were particularly apprized of Mr. Wilkes's incapacity, not only by the declaration of the house, but expressly by the writ directed to them, and, who nevertheless returned him as duly elected. They have rejected the majority of votes, the only criterion, by which our laws judge of the fense of the people; they have transferred the right of election from the collective to the representative body; and by these acts, taken separately or together, they have effentially altered the original constitution of the house of commons. Versed, as your Majesty undoubtedly is, in the English history, it cannot eafily escape you, how much it is your interest, as well as your duty to prevent one of the three estates from encroaching upon the province of the other two, or assuming the authority of them all. When once they have departed from the great constitutional line, by which all their proceedings should be directed, who will answer for their future moderation? Or what affurance will they give you, that, when they have trampled upon their equals, they will submit to a superior? Your Majesty may learn hereafter, how nearly the flave and tyrant are allied.

Some of your council, more candid than the rest, admit the abandoned profligacy of the present house of commons, but oppose their dissolution upon an opinion, I confess not very unwarrantable, that their successors would be equally at the disposal of the treasury. I cannot persuade myself that the nation will have profited so little by experience. But if that opinion were well sounded, you might then gratify our wishes at an easy rate, and appease the present clamour against your government, without offering any material injury to the savourite cause of corruption.

You have still an honourable part to act. The affections of your subjects may still be recovered. But before you subdue their hearts, you must gain a noble victory over your own. Discard those little, personal resentments, which have too long directed your public conduct. Pardon this man the remainder of his punishment, and if resentment still prevails, make it, what it should have been long since, an act, not of mercy, but contempt. He will soon fall back into his natural station,—a silent senator, and hardly supporting the weekly eloquence of a news paper. The gentle breath of peace would leave him on the surface, neglected and unremoved. It is only the tempest, that lifts him from his place.

WITHOUT confulting your minister, call togegether your whole council. Let it appear to the public that you can determine and act for yourfelf. Come forward to your people. Lay afide the wretched formalities of a King, and fpeak to your fobjects with the spirit of a man, and in the language of a gentleman. Tell them that you have been fatally deceived. The acknowledgment will be no difgrace, but rather an honour to your understanding. Tell them you are determined to remove every cause of complaint against your government; that you will give your confidence to no man, who does not possess the confidence of your subjects; and to leave it to themselves to determine, by their conduct at a future election, whether or no it be in reality the general fense of the nation, that their rights have been arbitrarily invaded by the present house of commons, and the constitution betrayed. They will then do justice to their representatives and to themfelves.

THESE sentiments, Sir, and the stile they are conveyed in, may be offensive, perhaps, because they are new to you. Accustomed to the language of courtiers, courtiers, you measure their affections by the vehemence of their expressions; and when they only praise you indirectly, you admire their sincerity. But this is not a time to triste with your fortune. They deceive you, Sir, who tell you that you have many friends, whose affections are sounded upon a principle of personal attachment. The first soundation of friendship is not the power of conferring benefits, but the equality with which they are received, and may be returned. The fortune, which made you a King, forbad you to have a friend. It is a law of nature which cannot be violated with impunity. The mistaken prince, who looks for friendship, will find a favourite, and in that favourite the ruin of his affairs.

THE people of England are loyal to the house of Hanover, not from a vain preference of one family to another, but from a conviction that the establishment of that family was necessary to the support of their civil and religious liberties. This, Sir, is a principle of allegiance equally folid and rational;fit for Englishmen to adopt, and well worthy of your Majesty's encouragement. We cannot long be deluded by nominal distinctions. The name of Stuart, of itself, is only contemptible; - armed with fovereign authority, their principles are formidable. The Prince, who imitates their conduct, should be warned by their example; and while he plumes himself apon the fecurity of his title to the crown, should remember that, as it was acquired by one revolution it may be lost by another.

JUNIUS.

LETTER XXXVI

TO HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF GRAFTON.

MY LORD,

14 Feb. 1770.

F I were perfonally your enemy I might pity and forgive you. You have every claim to compassion, that can arise from misery and distress. The condition you are reduced to would disarm a private enemy of his refentment, and leave no confolation to the most vindictive spirit, but that such an object, as you are, would difgrace the dignity of revenge. But in the relation you have borne to this country. you have no title to indulgence; and if I had followed the dictates of my own opinion, I never should have allowed you the retpite of a moment. In your public character, you have injured every subject of the empire; and though an individual is not authorifed to forgive the injuries done to fociety, he is called upon to affert his separate share in the public refentment. I submitted however to the judgment of men, more moderate, perhaps more candid than myfelf. For my own part, I do not pretend to understand those prudent forms of decorum, those gentle rules of discretion, which some men endeayour to unite with the conduct of the greatest and most hazardous affairs. Engaged in the defence of an honourable cause, I would take a decisive part .--I should scorn to provide for a future retreat, or to keep terms with a man, who preferves no measures with the public. Neither the abject submission of deferting his post in the hour of danger, nor even the

the * facred shield of cowardice should protect him. I would pursue him through life, and try the last exertion of my abilities to preserve the perishable infamy of his name, and make it immortal.

WHAT then, my Lord, is this the event of all the facrifices you have made to Lord Bute's patronage, and to your own unfortunate ambition? Was it for this you abandoned your earliest friendships,—the warmest connexions of your youth, and all those honourable engagements, by which you once folicited, and might have acquired the esteem of your country? Have you fecured no recompence for fuch waste of honour?-Unhappy man! what party will receive the common deferter of all parties? Without a client to flatter, without a friend to confole you, and with only one companion from the honest house of Bloomsbury, you must now retire into a dreadful folitude. At the most active period of life, you must quit the busy scene, and conceal yourfelf from the world, if you would hope to fave the wretched remains of a ruined reputation. The vices operate like age, -bring on difease before its time, and in the prime of youth leave the character broken and exhausted.

YET your conduct has been mysterious, as well as contemptible. Where is now that sirmness, or obstinacy so long boasted of by your friends, and acknowledged by your enemies? We were taught to expect, that you would not leave the ruin of this country to be compleated by other hands, but were determined either to gain a decisive victory over the consitution, or to perish bravely at least behind the last dike of the prerogative. You knew the danger, and might have been provided for it. You took fufficient time to prepare for a meeting with your parliament, to confirm the mercenary fidelity of your dependants, and to fuggect to your Sovereign a language fuited to his dignity at least, if not to his benevolence and wifdom. Yet, while the whole kingdom was agitated with anxious expectation upon one great point, you meanly evaded the question, and, instead of the explicit firmness and decision of a King, you gave us nothing but the mifery of a ruined * grazier, and the whining piety of a Methodift. We had reason to expect, that notice would have been taken of the petitions which the king has received from the English nation; and although I can conceive some personal motives for not yielding to them, I can find none, in common prudence or decency, for treating them with contempt. Be affured, my Lord, the English people will not tamely submit to this unworthy treatment; - they had a right to be heard, and their petitions, if not granted, deferved to be confidered. Whatever be the real views and doctrine of a court, the Sovereign should be taught to preferve some forms of attention to his subjects, and if he will not redress their grievances, not to make them a topic of jest and mockery among fords and ladies of the bedchamber. Injuries may be atoned for and forgiven; but infults admit of no compensation. They degrade the mind in its own effeem, and force it to recover its level by revenge.

^{*} ____ Sacra tramuere timors. Every coward pretends to be planet-struck.

There was something wonderfully pathetic in the mention of the horned cattle.

This neglect of the petitions was however a part of your original plan of government, nor will any consequences it has produced account for your deferting your Sovereign, in the midst of that distress, in which you and your * new friends had involved him. One would think, my Lord, you might have taken this spirited resolution before you had disolved the last of those early connexions, which once, even in your own opinion, did honour to your youth ;before you had obliged lord Granby to quit a fervice he was attached to ;-before you had discarded one chancellor, and killed another. To what an abject condition have you laboured to reduce the best of princes, when the unhappy man, who yields at last to such personal instance and solicitation, as never can be fairly employed against a subject, feels himfelf degraded by his compliance, and is unable to furvive the difgraceful honours which his gracious Sovereign had compelled him to accept. a man of fpirit, for he had a quick sense of shame, and death has redeemed his character. your grace too well to appeal to your feelings upon this event; but there is another heart, not yet, I hope, quite callous to the touch of humanity, to which it ought to be a dreadful leffon for ever +.

Now, my Lord, let us confider the fituation to which you have conducted, and in which you thought it adviseable to abandon your royal master. Whenever the people have complained, and nothing better could be faid in defence of the measures of government, it has been the fashion to answer us, though not very fairly, with an appeal to the private virtues of your Sovereign. "Has he not, to relieve "the people, furrendered a confiderable part of his " revenue?--Has he not made the judges inde-" pendent, by fixing them in their places for life?" -My Lord, we acknowledge the gracious principle, which gave birth to these concessions, and have nothing to regret, but that it has never been adhered to. At the end of feven years, we are loaded with a debt of above five hundred thousand pounds upon the civillift, and we now see the Chancellor of Great Britain tyrannically forced out of his office, not for want of abilities, not for want of integrity, or of attention to his duty, but for delivering his honest opinion in parliament, upon the greatest constitutional question, that has arisen since the revolution .-We care not to whose private virtues you appeal; the theory of such government is falsehood and mockery; -the practice is oppression. You have laboured then (though I confess to no purpose) to rob your mafter of the only plaufible answer, that ever was given in defence of his government, -of the opinion, which the people had conceived of his perfonal honour and integrity.—The Duke of Bedford was more moderate than your Grace. He only forced his mafter to violate a folemn promise made to an * individual. But you, my Lord, have fuccefsfully extended your advice to every political, every moral engagement, that could bind either the magistrate or the man. The condition of a King is often miserable, but it required your Grace's abilities to make it contemptible. - You will fay perhaps that the faithful fervants, in whose hands you have left him, are able to retrieve his honour, and to fupport his government. You have publickly declared, even fince your refignation, that you approved of their measures, and admired their conduct, -- particularly that of the Earl of Sandwich. What a pity it is, that, with all this appearance, you should think it necessary to separate yourself from such amiable companions? You forget, my Lord, that while you are lavish in the praise of men whom you defert, you are publicly opposing your conduct to your opinions, and depriving yourfelf of the only plaufible pretence you had for leaving your Sovereign overwhelmed with diffres; I call it plausible, for, in truth, there is no reason whatsoever, less than the frowns of your mafter, that could justify a man of spirit for abandoning his post at a moment so critical and important? It is in vain to evade the queftion. If you will not speak out, the public have a right to judge from appearances. We are authorized to conclude, that you either differ from your colleagues, whose measures you still affect to defend, or that you thought the administration of the King's affairs no longer tenable. You are at liberty to choose between the hypocrite and the coward. Your best friends are in doubt which way they shall incline. Your country unites the characters, and gives you credit for them both. For my own part, I fee nothing inconfishent in your conduct. You began with betraying the people, -you conclude with betraying the King.

[.] The Bedford party.

⁺ The most fecret particulars of this detessable transaction shall, in due time, be given to the public. The people shall know what kind of man they have to deal with.

In your treatment of particular persons, you have preserved the uniformity of your character. Even Mr. Bradshaw declares, that no man was ever fo ill used as himself. As to the provision * you have made for his family, he was intitled to it by the house he lives in. The successor of one Chancellor might well pretend to be the rival of another. It is the breach of private friendship which touches Mr. Bradshaw; and to fay the truth, when a man of his rank and abilities had taken fo active a part in your affairs, he ought not to have been let down at last with a miserable pension of fifteen hundred pounds a year. Colonel Luttrell, Mr. Onflow, and Governor Burgoyne, were equally engaged with you, and have rather more reason to complain than Mr. Bradshaw. These are men, my Lord, whose friendship you should have adhered to on the same principle, on which you deferted Lord Rockingham, Lord Chatham, Lord Camden, and the Duke of Portland. We can eafily account for your violating your engagements with men of honour, but why should you betray

A pension of 1300 l. per annum, insured upon the 4 1-half per cents, (he was too cunning to trust to instrict upon the 1 ves of himself and all his sons. This gentleman, who a very few years ago was clerk to a contractor for forage, and afterwards exalted to a petty post in the war office, thought it necessary (as soon as he was appointed Secretary to the Treasury) to take that great house in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, in which the Earl of Northington had resided, while he was Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain. As to the bension, Lord North very solemnly assured the house of commons, that no pension was ever so well deserved as Mr. Bradshaw's——N. B. Lord Camden and Sir Jeffery Amherst are not near so well provided for, and Sir Edward Hawke, who saved the state, retires with two thousand pounds a year, on the Irish establishment, from which he in tact receives less than Mr. Bradshaw's pension.

your natural connexions? Why separate yourself from Lord Sandwich, Lord Gower, and Mr. Rigby, or leave the three worthy gentlemen above-mentioned to shift for themselves? With all the sashionable indulgence of the times, this country does not abound in characters like theirs; and you may find it a difficult matter to recruit the black catalogue of your friends.

THE recollection of the royal patent you fold to Mr. Hine, obliges me to fay a word in defence of a man whom you have taken the most dishonourable means to injure. I do not refer to the shain profecution which you affected to carry on against him. On that ground, I doubt not he is prepared to meet you with tenfold recrimination, and fet you at defiance. The injury you had done him affects his moral character. You knew that the offer to purchase the reversion of a place, which has heretofore been fold under a decree of the court of Chancery, however imprudent in his fituation, would no way tend to cover him with that fort of guilt which you wished to fix upon him in the eyes of the world. You laboured then, by every species of false suggestion, and even by publishing counterfeit letters, to have it understood that he had proposed terms of accommodation to you, and had offered to abandon his principles, his party, and his friends: You consulted your own breast for a character of confummate treachery, and gave it to the public for that of Mr. Vaughan. I think myfelf obliged to do this justice to an injured man, because I was deceived by the appearances thrown out by your Grace, and have frequently spoken of his conduct with indignation. If he really be, what I think him, honeft, though mistaken, he will be happy in recovering his reputation, though at the expence of his understanding. Here, I see, the matter is likely to rest. Your Grace is asraid to carry on the protecution. Mr. Hine keeps quiet possession of his purchase; and Governor Burgoyne, relieved from the apprehension of refunding the money, sits down, for the remainder of his life, INFAMOUS AND CONTENTED.

I BELIEVE, my Lord, I may now take my leave of you for ever. You are no longer that resolute minister, who had spirit to support the most violent measures; who compensated for the want of good. and great qualities, by a brave determination, (which fome people admired and relied on) to maintain himself without them. The reputation of obstinacy and perfeverance might have supplied the place of all the abfent virtues. You have now added the last negative to your character, and meanly confessed that you are destitute of the common spirit of a man. Retire then, my Lord, and hide your blushes from the world; for, with such a load of shame, even BLACK may change its colour. mind fuch as yours, in the folitary hours of domeftic enjoyment, may still find topics of consolation. You may find it in the memory of violated friendthip; in the afflictions of an accomplished prince, whom you have difgraced and deferted, and in the agitations of a great country, driven, by your councils, to the brink of destruction.

THE palm of ministerial firmness is now transferred to Lord North. He tells us so himself, with the plenitude of the ore rotundo *; and I am ready enough to believe, that, while he can keep his place, he will not easily be perfuaded to resign it. Your Grace was the firm minister of yesterday: Lord North is the firm minister of to-day. To-morrow, perhaps, his Majesty, in his wisdom, may give us a rival for you both. You are too well acquainted with the temper of your late allies, to think it poffible that Lord North should be permitted to govern this country. If we may believe common fame, they have thewn him their superiority already. His Majesty is indeed too gracious to insult his fubjects, by chufing his first minister from among the domestics of the Duke of Bedford. That would have been too gross an outrage to the three kingdoms. Their purpose, however, is equally answered by pushing forward this unhappy figure, and forcing it to bear the odium of measures, which they in reality direct. Without immediately appearing to govern, they possess the power, and didribute the emoluments of government as they think proper. They still adhere to the spirit of that calculation, which made Mr. Luttrell representative of Middlefex. Far from regretting your retreat, they affure us very gravely, that it encreases the real strength of the ministry. According to this way of reasoning, they will probably grow stronger, and more flourishing, every hour they exist; for I think there is hardly a day passes in which some one or other of his Majesty's servants does not leave them their countenances speak a different language. When the members drop off, the main body cannot be infensible of its approaching dissolution. Even the violence of their proceedings is a signal of despair. Like broken tenants, who have had warning to quit the premises, they curse their landlord, destroy the fixtures, throw every thing into confusion, and care not what mischief they do to the estate.

^{*} This eloquent person has got as far as the discipline of Demosthenes. He constantly speaks with peobles in his mouth, to improve his articulation.

JUNIUS.

LETTER XXXVII.

TO THE PRINTER OF THE PUBLIC AD-VERTISER.

19 March, 1770. SIR. BELIEVE there is no man, however indifferent about the interests of this country, who will not readily confess that the fituation, to which we are now reduced, whether it has arisen from the violence of faction, or from an arbitrary system of government, justifies the most melancholy apprehenfions, and calls for the exertion of whatever wildon or vigour is left among us. The King's answer to the remonstrance of the city of London, and the measures fince adopted by the ministry, amount to a plain declaration, that the principle, on which Mr. Luttrell was feated in the house of commons, is to be supported in all its confequences, and carried to its utmost extent. The same spirit, which violated the freedom of election, now invades the declaration and bill of rights, and threatens to punith the subject for exercising a privilege, hitherto undi undisputed, of petitioning the crown. The grievances of the people are aggravated by infults; their complaints not merely difregarded, but checked by authority; and every one of those acts, against which they remonstrated, confirmed by the King's decifive approbation. At such a moment, no honest man will remain filent or inactive. However distinguished by rank or property, in the rights of freedom we are all equal. As we are Englishmen, the least confiderable man among us has an interest equal to the proudest nobleman, in the laws and constitution of his country, and is equally called upon to make a generous contribution in support of them; -whether it be the heart to conceive, the understanding to direct, or the hand to execute. It is a common cause, in which we are all interested, in which we should all be engaged. The man who deferts it at this alarming crifis, is an enemy to his country, and, what I think of infinitely less importance, a traitor to his Sovereign. The subject, who is truly loyal to the chief magistrate, will neither advise nor submit to arbitrary measures. The city of London have given an example, which, I doubt not, will be followed by the whole kingdom. The noble spirit of the metropolis is the life-blood of the state, collected at the heart: from that point it circulates, with health and vigour, through every artery of the constitution. The time is come, when the body of the English people must affert their own cause: conscious of their strength, and animated by a fense of their duty, they will not furrender their birthright to ministers, parliaments, or kings.

THE city of London have expressed their sentiments with freedom and firmness; they have spoken truth boldly; and, in whatever light their remonstrance may be represented by courtiers, I defy the most subtle lawyer in this country to point out a fingle instance, in which they have exceeded the truth. Even that affertion, which we are told is most offenfive to parliament, in the theory of the English constitution, is strictly true. If any part of the representative body be not chosen by the people, that part vitiates and corrupts the whole. If there be a defect in the representation of the people, that power, which alone is equal to the making of the laws in this country, is not complete, and the acts of parliament under that circumstance, are not the acts of a pure and entire legislature. I speak of the theory of our constitution; and whatever difficulties or inconveniencies may attend the practice, I am ready to maintain, that, as far as the fact deviates from the principle, fo far the practice is vicious and corrupt. I have not heard a question raised upon any other part of the remonstrance. That the principle, on which the Middlefex election was determined, is more pernicious in its effects, than either the levying of ship-money, by Charles the First, or the fufpending power affumed by his fon, will hardly be disputed by any man who understands or wishes well to the English constitution. It is not an act of open violence done by the King, or any direct or palpable breach of the laws attempted by his minister, that can ever endanger the liberties of this country. Against such a King or minister the people would immediately take the alarm, and all the parties parties unite to oppose him. The laws may be grossly violated in particular instances, without any direct attack upon the whole system. Facts of that kind stand alone; they are attributed to necessity, not defended by principle. We can never be really in danger, until the forms of parliament are made use of to destroy the substance of our civil and political liberties;—until parliament itself betrays its trust, by contributing to establish new principles of government, and employing the very weapons committed to it by the collective body, to stab the constitution.

As for the terms of the remonstrance, I presume it will not be affirmed, by any person less polished than a gentleman usher, that this is a season for compliments. Our gracious King indeed is abundantly civil to himself. Instead of an answer to a perition, his majesty, very gracefully pronounces his own panegyric; and I confess, that, as far as his perfonal behaviour, or the royal purity of his intentions is concerned, the truth of those declarations, which the minister has drawn up for his master, cannot decently be disputed. In every other respect, I affirm, that they are absolutely unsupported, either in argument or fact. I must add 100, that supposing the speech were otherwise unexceptionable, it is not a direct answer to the petition of the city. His Majesty is pleased to say, that he is always ready to receive the requests of his fubjects; yet the sheriffs were twice sent back with an excuse, and it was certainly debated in council whether or no the magistrates of the city of London should be admitted to an audience. Whether the remonstrance be or be not injurious to parliament, is the very question between the parliament and the people, and fuch a question as cannot be decided by the affertion of a third party, however respectable. That the petitioning for a dissolution of parliament is irreconcileable with the principles of the constitution is a new doctrine. Majesty perhaps has not been informed, that the house of commons themselves have, by a formal resolution, admitted it to be the right of the subject. His Majesty proceeds to affure us that he has made the laws the rule of his conduct .- Was it in ordering or permitting his ministers to apprehend Mr. Wilkes by a general warrant?-Was it in suffering his ministers to revive the obsolete maxim of nullum tempus to rob the Duke of Pertland of his property, and thereby give a decifive turn to a county election?-Was it in erecting a chamber confultation of furgeons, with authority to examine into and superfede the legal verdict of a jury? Or did his Majesty consult the laws of this country. when he permitted his secretary of state to declare. that whenever the civil magistrate is trifled with, a military force must be fent for, without the delay of a moment, and effectually employed? Or was it in the barbarous exactness with which this illegal, inhuman doctrine was carried into execution ?- If his Majesty had recollected these facts, I think he would never have faid, at least with any reference to the measures of his government, that he had made the laws the rule of his conduct. To talk of preferving the affections, or relying on the support of his fubicets, while he continues to act upon these principles.

ciples, is indeed paying a compliment to their loyalty, which I hope they have too much spirit and understanding to deferve.

His Majesty, we are told, is not only punctual in the performance of his own duty, but careful not to assume any of those powers which the constitution has placed in other hands. Admitting this last affertion to be strictly true, it is no way to the pur-Bole. The city of London have not defired the King to assume a power placed in other hands. If they had, I should hope to see the person, who dared to prefent such a petition, immediately impeached. They folicit their Sovereign to exert that conflitutional authority, which the laws have vested in him, for the benefit of his subjects. They call upon him to make use of his lawful prerogative in a case, which our laws evidently supposed might happen, fince they have provided for it by truffing the Sovereign with a discretionary power to dissolve the parliament. This request will, I am confident, be supported by remonstrances from all parts of the kingdom. His Majesty will find at last, that this is the fense of his people, and that it is not his interell to support either ministry or parliament, at the hazard of a breach with the collective body of his fubjects.—'That he is the King of a free people, is indeed his greatest glory. That he may long continue the King of a free people, is the second with that animates my heart. The first is, THAT THE PEOPLE MAY BE FREE.*

JUNIUS.

^{*} When his Majesty had done reading his speech, the Lord Mayor, see had the honour of kissing his Majesty's hand; after which, as

LETTER XXXVIII.

TO THE PRINTER OF THE PUBLIC AD VERTISER.

SIR. 3 April. 1770. IN my last letter I offered you my opinion of the A truth and propriety of his Majesty's answer to the city of London, confidering it merely as the speech of a minister, drawn up in his own defence. and delivered, as usual, by the chief magistrate. I would feparate, as much as possible, the King's perfonal character and behaviour from the acts of the prefent government. I wish it to be understood that his Majesty had in effect no more concern in the fubstance of what he faid, than Sir James Hodges had in the remonstrance, and that as Sir James, in virtue of his office, was obliged to fpeak the fentiments of the people, his Majesty might think himfelf bound, by the same official obligation, to give a graceful utterance to the fentiments of his minifter. The cold formality of a well repeated lesson is widely distant from the animated expression of the heart.

This distinction, however, is only true with respect to the measure itself. The consequences of it reach beyond the minister, and materially affect his Majesty's honour. In their own nature they are formidable enough to alarm a man of prudence, and disgraceful enough to afflict a man of spirit. A person and family is founded upon rational principles, will not, in the present conjuncture, be scrupulous of alarming, or even of afflicting his Sovereign. I know there is another fort of loyalty, of which his Majesty has had plentiful experience. When the loyalty of Tories, Jacobites, and Scotchmen, has once taken possession of an unhappy Prince, it seldom leaves him without accomplishing his destruction. When the posson of their doctrines has tainted the natural benevolence of his disposition, when their insidious counsels have corrupted the stamina of his government, what antidote can restore him to his political health and honour, but the sixm sincerity of his English subjects?

they were withdrawing, his Majesty instantly turned round to his courtiers, and burst out a laughing.

Nere fiddled, wille Rime was burning. John Horne.

It has not been usual in this country, at least since the days of Charles the first, to see the sovereign personally at variance, or engaged in a direct altercation with his subjects. Acts of grace and indulgence are wifely appropriated to him, and should constantly be performed by himself. He never should appear but in an amiable light to his subjects. Even in France, as long as any ideas of a limited monarchy were thought worth preferving, it was a maxim, that no man fhould leave the royal prefence discontented. They have lost or renounced the moderate principles of their government, and now, when their parliaments venture to remonstrate, the tyrant comes forward, and answers absolutely for himself. The spirit of their present constitution requires that the King should be feared, and the principle, I believe, is tolerably supported by the fact. But, in our political fustem, the theory is at variance with the practice, for the King should be beloved. Measures of greater severity may, indeed, in some circumstances, be necessary; but the minister who advises, should take the execution and edium of them entirely upon himfelf. He not only betrays his mafter, but violates the foirit of the English conflitution, when he exposes the chief magistrate to the personal harred or contempt of his subjects. When we speak of the firmness of government, we, mean an uniform fystem of measures, deliberately adopted, and refolutely maintained by the fervants of the crown, not a peevish asperity in the language or behaviour of the fovereign. The government of a weak, irrefolute monarch may be wife, moderate, and firm; -that of an obstinate capricious prince, on the contrary, may be feeble, undetermined and relaxed. The reputation of public measures depends upon the minister, who is responsible, not upon the King, whose private opinions are not supposed to have any weight against the advice of his counsel, whose personal authority should therefore never be interposed in public affairs.—This, I believe, is true, conflitutional doctrine. But for a moment let us suppose it false. Let it be taken for granted, that an occasion may arise, in which a King of England shall be compelled to take upon himself the ungrateful office of rejecting the petitions, and cenfuring the conduct of his subjects; and let the City remonfrance be supposed to have created so extraordinary an occasion. On this principle, which I prefume no friend of administration will dispute, let the wisdom and spirit of the ministry be examined. They advise the King to hazard his dignity, by a positive declaration ration of his own femiments : - they furgeth to him a language full of feverity and reproach. What follows? When his Majesty had taken so decisive a part in support of his ministry and parliament, he had a right to expect from them a reciprocal demonstration of firmness in their own cause, and of their zeal for his honour. He had reason to expect (and fuch, I doubt not, were the bluftering promifes of Lord North) that the persons, whom he had been advised to charge with having failed in their respect to him, with having injured parliament, and violated the principles of the conflicution, should not have been permitted to escape without some severe marks of the displeasure and vengeance of parliament. As the matter stands, the minister, after placing his lovereign in the most unfavourable light to his fubjects, and after attempting to fix the ridicule and odium of his own precipitate measures upon the royal character, leaves him a folicary figure upon the icene, to recal, if he can, or to compeniate, by future compliances, for one unhappy demonstration of ill-tupported firmnels, and inerrectual refentment. As a man of spirit, his Majesty cannot but be sensible, that the lofty terms in which he was perfunded to reprimand the city, when united with the fully conclusion of the business, resemble the pomp of a mocktragedy, where the most pathetic fentiments, and even the fufferings of the hero are calculated for derifion.

SUCH has been the boaked firmness and confidency of a minister, * whose appearance in the house of commons

^{*} This graceful minister is oddly conformed. His tengue is a commons was thought effential to the King's fervice ; -whose presence was to influence every division :who had a voice to perfuade, an eye to penetrate, a gesture to command. The reputation of these great qualities has been fatal to his friends. little dignity of Mr. Ellis, has been committed. The mine was funk ;-combustibles provided, and Welbore Ellis, the Guy Faux of the fable, waited only for the fignal of command. All of a fudden the country gentlemen discover how grossly they have been deceived; -the minister's heart fails him, the grand plot is defeated in a moment, and poor Mr. Ellis and his motion taken into custody. From the event of Friday last, one would imagine, that fome fatality hung over this gentleman. Whether he makes or suppresses a motion, he is equally sure of difgrace. But the complexion of the times will fuffer no man to be vice-treasurer of Ireland with impunity + fittle too big for his mouth, and his eyes a great deal too big for their fockets. Every part of his person sets natural proportion at defiance. At this present writing, his head is supposed to be much too heavy for his shoulders.

About this time, the countiers talked of nothing but a bill of pains and penalties against the Lord Mayor and Sheriss, or impeachment at the least. Little Mannikin Ellis told the King that, if the business were sest to his management, he would engage to do wonders. It was thought very odd that a motion of so much importance should be intrusted to the most contemptible little piece of machinery in the whole kingdom. His honest zeal however was disappointed. The minister took fright, and at the very instant that little Ellis was going to open, sent him an order to sit down. All their magnanimous threats ended in a tidiculous vote of censure, and still more ridiculous address to the King. This shameful desertion so afflicted the generous mind of Cleorge the Third, that he was obliged to live upon potatoes for three weeks, to keep off a malignant sever—Poor man singular talia fands tempered a larrymins.

I DO not mean to express the smallest anxiety for the minister's reputation. He acts separately for himself, and the most shameful inconsistency may perhaps be no differace to him. But when the Sovereign, who reprefents the majesty of the state, appears in person, his dignity should be supported;the plan well confidered; - the execution steady and My zeal for his Majesty's real honour compels me to affert, that it has been too much the lystem of the present reign, to introduce him perionally, either to act for, or to defend his fervants. They perfuade him to do what is properly their buinefs, and defert him in the midft of it *. is an inconvenience, to which he must for ever be exposed, while he adheres to a ministry divided among themselves, or unequal in credit and ability to the great task they have undertaken. Instead of referving the interpolition of the royal personage, as the last resource of government, their weakness obliges them to apply it to every ordinary occasion, and to render it cheap and common in the opinion of the people. Instead of supporting their master, they look to him for support; and, for the emoluments of remaining one day more in office, care not how much his facred character is proftituted and difhonoured.

If I thought it possible for this paper to reach the closet, I would venture to appeal at once to his Maiesty's judgment. I would ask him, but in the most

^{*} After a certain person had succeeded in cajolling Mr. Voike, he told the Dake of Gratton, with a wifty smile, "My Lord, you may kill the next Percy yourself.--N. B. He had but that rust ant wiped the tears away, which over ame Mr. Yorke respectful terms, "As you are a young man, Sir, "who ought to have a life of happiness in prospect; "—as you are a husband;—as you are a father

" [your filial duties I own have been religiously per-"formed] is it bona fide for your interest or your ho-

" nour to facrifice your domestic tranquility, and to " live in a perpetual difagreement with your people, merely to preferve such a chain of beings as North,

"Barrington, Weymouth, Gower, Ellis, Onflow, Rigby, Jerry Dyfon, and Sandwich? Their very

" names are a fatire upon all government, and I de-

" fy the gravest of your chaplains to read the cata-

" logue without laughing."

FOR my own part, Sir, I have always confidered addresses from parliament as a fashionable, unmeaning formality. Usurpers, idiots, and tyrants have been fuccessively complimented with almost the same professions of duty and affection. But let us suppose them to mean exactly what they profess. The confequences deserve to be considered. Either the fovereign is a man of high spirit and dangerous ambition, ready to take advantage of the treachery of his parliament, ready to accept of the furrender they make him of the public liberty; - or he is a mild, undefigning prince, who, provided they indulge him with state and pageantry, would of himself intend no mitchief. On the first supposition, it must foon be decided by the fword, whether the conflitution should be lost or preferved. On the fecond, a prince no way qualified for the execution of a great and hazardous enterprize, and without any determined object in view, may neverthelets be driven into fuch desperate measures, as may lead directly to his ruin, or difgrace grace himself by a shameful fluctuation between the extremes of violence at one moment, and timidity at another. The minister perhaps may have reason to be fatisfied with the fuccess of the present hour, and with the profits of his employment. He is the tenant of the day, and has no interest in the inheritance. The fovereign himfelf is bound by other obligations, and ought to look forward to a superior, a permanent interest. His paternal tenderness should remind him, how many hostages he has given to society. The ties of nature come powerfully in aid of oaths and protestations. The father, who confiders his own precarious state of health, and the possible hazard of a long minority, will with to fee the family estate free and unincumbered *. What is the dignity of the crown, though it were really maintained; -what is the honour of parliament, suppoling it could exist without any foundation of integrity and justice; -or what is the vain reputation of firmness, even if the scheme of the government were uniform and confiftent, compared with the heart-felt affections of the people, with the happiness and security of the royal family, or even with the grateful acclamations of the populace! Whatever style of contempt may be adopted by ministers or parliaments, no man fincerely despifes the voice of the English nation. The house of commons are only interpreters, whose duty it is to convey the sense of the people faithfully to the crown. If the interpretation be false or imperfect, the confti-

^{*} Every true Friend of the House of Brunswick sees with affliction, how tapidly some of the principal branches of the family have dropped off.

tuent powers are called upon to deliver their own fentiments. Their speech is rude, but intelligible; —their gesture sierce, but sull of explanation. Perplexed by sophistries, their honest eloquence rises into action. Their sirst appeal was to the integrity of their representatives:—the second to the King's justice;—the last argument of the people, whenever they have recourse to it, will carry more perhaps than persuasion to parliament, or supplication to the throne.

JUNIUS.

LETTER XXXIX.

TO THE PRINTER OF THE PUBLIC AD-VERTISER.

SIR. 28 May, 1770. THILE parliament was fitting, it would neither have been safe, nor perhaps quite regular, to offer any opinion to the public, upon the justice or wisdom of their proceedings. To pronounce fairly upon their conduct, it was necessary to wait until we could confider, in one view, the beginning, progrefs, and conclusion of their deli-The cause of the public was undertaken and supported by men, whose abilities and united authority, to fay nothing of the advantageous ground they flood on, might well be thought fufficient to determine a popular question in favour of the people. Neither was the house of commons so absolutely engaged in defence of the ministry, or even of their own resolutions, but that they might have paid some decent regard to the known disposition of their constituents, and, without any dishonour to their firminess, might have retracted an opinion too hastily adopted, when they saw the alarm it had created, and how strongly it was opposed by the general sense of the nation. niftry too would have confulted their own immediate interest, in making some concession satisfactory to the moderate part of the people. Without touching the fact, they might have confented to guard against, or give up the dangerous principle, on which it was established. In this state of things, I think it was highly improbable at the beginning of the fession, that the complaints of the people upon a matter, which, in their apprehension at least, immediately affected the life of the constitution, would be treated with as much contempt by their own representatives, and by the house of lords, as they had been by the other branch of the legislature. Despairing of their integrity, we had a right to expect fomething from their prudence, and fomething from their fears. The Duke of Grafton certainly did not forefee to what an extent the corruption of a parliament might be carried. He thought, perhaps, that there was still some portion of shame or virtue left in the majority of the house of commons, or that there was a line in public proflitution, beyond which they would fcruple to proceed. the young man been a little more practifed in the world, or had he ventured to measure the characters of other men by his own, he would not have been fo eafily discouraged.

THE prorogation of parliament naturally calls upon us to review their proceedings, and to confi-Vol. II. E der tuent powers are called upon to deliver their own fentiments. Their speech is rude, but intelligible; —their gesture sierce, but full of explanation. Perplexed by sophistries, their honest eloquence rises into action. Their sirst appeal was to the integrity of their representatives:—the second to the King's justice;—the last argument of the people, whenever they have recourse to it, will carry more perhaps than persuasion to parliament, or supplication to the throne.

JUNIUS.

LETTER XXXIX.

TO THE PRINTER OF THE PUBLIC AD-

28 May, 1770. SIR. HILE parliament was sitting, it would neither have been safe, nor perhaps quite regular, to offer any opinion to the public, upon the justice or wisdom of their proceedings. To pronounce fairly upon their conduct, it was necessary to wait until we could confider, in one view, the beginning, progress, and conclusion of their deli-The cause of the public was undertaberations. ken and supported by men, whose abilities and united authority, to fay nothing of the advantageous ground they flood on, might well be thought fufficient to determine a popular question in favour of the people. Neither was the house of commons so absolutely engaged in defence of the ministry, or even of their own refolutions, but that they might have paid some decent regard to the known disposition tion of their constituents, and, without any dishonour to their firm:nefs, might have retracted an opinion too hastily adopted, when they saw the alarm it had created, and how strongly it was opposed by the general sense of the nation. The miniftry too would have confulted their own immediate interest, in making some concession satisfactory to the moderate part of the people. Without touching the fact, they might have confented to guard against, or give up the dangerous principle, on which it was established. In this state of things. I think it was highly improbable at the beginning of the fession, that the complaints of the people upon a matter, which, in their apprehension at least, immediately affected the life of the constitution, would be treated with as much contempt by their own representatives, and by the house of lords, as they had been by the other branch of the legiflature. Despairing of their integrity, we had a right to expect fomething from their prudence, and fomething from their fears. The Duke of Grafton certainly did not forefee to what an extent the corruption of a parliament might be carried. He thought, perhaps, that there was still some portion of shame or virtue left in the majority of the house of commons, or that there was a line in public proffitution, beyond which they would foruple to proceed. Had the young man been a little more practifed in the world, or had he ventured to measure the characters of other men by his own, he would not have been fo easily discouraged.

THE prorogation of parliament naturally calls upon us to review their proceedings, and to confi-Vol. II. E der der the condition in which they have left the kingdom. I do not question but they have done what is usually called the King's business, much to his Majesty's satisfaction. We have only to lament, that, in confequence of a system introduced or revived in the present reign, this kind of merit should be very confistent with the neglect of every duty they owe to the nation. The interval between the opening of the last and close of the former session was longer than usual. Whatever were the views of the minister in deferring the meeting of parliament, fufficient time was certainly given to every member of the house of commons, to look back upon the steps he had taken, and the consequences they had produced. The zeal of party, the violence of personal animofities, and the heat of contention had leifure to fubfide. From that period, whatever refolution they took was deliberate and prepenfe. In the preceding festion, the dependents of the ministry had affected to believe, that the final determination of the question would have satisfied the nation, or at least put a stop to their complaints; as if the certainty of an evil could dimnift the fense of it, or the nature of injustice could be altered by decision. But they found the people of England were in a temper very distant from fubrusfion; and, although it was contended that the house of commons could not themselves reverse a resolution, which had the force and effect of a judicial fentence, there were other conflitutional expedients, which would have given a fecurity against any fimilar attempts for the future. The general proposition, in which the whole country had an interelt.

rest, might have been reduced to a particular fact. in which Mr. Wilkes and Mr. Luttrell would alone have been concerned. The house of lords might interpole; - the King might diffolve the parliament; -or, if every other refource failed, there still lav a grand constitutional writ of error, in behalf of the people, from the decision of one court to the wisdom of the whole legislature. Every one of these remedies has been fuccessively attempted. The people performed their part with dignity, spirit, and perseverance. For many months his Majesty heard nothing from his people but the language of complaint and refentment; -unhappily for this country, it was the daily triumph of his courtiers that he heard it with an indifference approaching to contempt.

THE house of commons having assumed a power unknown to the conflitution, were determined not merely to support it in the single instance in question, but to maintain the doctrine in its utmost extent, and to establish the fact as a precedent in law, to be applied in whatever manner his Majesty's servants should hereafter think fit. Their proceedings upon this occasion are a strong proof that a decision, in the first instance illegal and unjust, can only be supported by a continuation of falsehood and injus-To support their former resolutions, they were obliged to violate fome of the best known and established rules of the house. In one instance they went fo far as to declare, in open defiance of truth and common sense, that it was not the rule of the house to divide a complicated question, at the request of a member*. But after trampling upon the laws of the land, it was not wonderful that they should treat the private regulations of their own afsembly with equal difregard. The speaker, being young in office, began with pretended ignorance, and ended with deciding for the ministry. We were not surprized at the decision; but he hesitated and blushed at his own baseness, and every man was assonished †.

THE interest of the public was vigorously supported in the house of lords. Their right to defend the constitution against an incroachment of the other estates, and the necessity of exerting it at this period, was urged to them with every argument, that could be supposed to influence the heart or the understanding. But it soon appeared, that they had already taken their part, and were determined to support the house of commons, not only at the expence of truth and decency, but even by a surrender of their own most important rights. Instead of

- This extravagant resolution appears in the Votes of the house; but, in the minutes of the committees, the instances of resolutions contrary to law and truth, or of refusals to acknowledge law and truth when proposed to them, are innumerable.
- + When the King first made it a measure of his government to destroy Mr. Wilkes, and when for this purpose it was necessary to run down privilege, Sir Fletcher Norton, with his usual profittuted effrontery, assured the house of commons, that he should regard one of their votes, no more than a resolution of so many drunken porters. This is the very Lawyer, whom Ben Johnson describes in the followlowing lines:
 - " Gives forked counsel; takes provoking gold,

" On either hand, and puts it up.

" So wife, so grave, of so perplex'd a tongue,

" Lie Rill without a fee,"

[&]quot; And loud withal, that would not wag, nor fearce

performing that duty which the constitution expected from them, in return for the dignity and independence of their station, in return for the hereditary share it has given them in the legislature, the majority of them made common cause with the other house in oppressing the people, and established another doctrine as false in itself, and if possible more pernicious to the constitution, than that on which the Middlefex election was determined. By refolving, " that they had no right to impeach a " judgment of the house of commons in any case " whatfoever, where that house has a competent "jurisdiction," they in effect gave up that conftitutional check and reciprocal controul of one branch of the legislature over the other, which is perhaps the greatest and most important object provided for by the division of the whole legislative power into three estates; and now, let the judicial decisions of the house of commons be ever so extravagant, let their declarations of the law be ever so flagrantly false, arbitrary, and oppressive to the subject, the house of lords have imposed a flavish filence upon themselves; -- they cannot interpose, -- they cannot protect the subject, - they cannot defend the laws of their country. A concession so extraordinary in itfelf, so contradictory to the principles of their own institution, cannot but alarm the most unsuspecting mind. We may well conclude, that the lords would hardly have yielded so much to the other house, without the certainty of a compensation. which can only be made to them at the expence of ~E 3 the

the people *. The arbitrary power they have affumed of imposing fines and committing, during pleafure, will now be exercised in its full extent. house of commons are too much in their debt to question or interrupt their proceedings. The crown too, we may be well affured, will lose nothing in this new diffribution of power. After declaring, that to petition for a dissolution of parliament is irreconcileable with the principles of the constitution, his Majesty has reason to expect that some extraordinary compliment will be returned to the Royal prerogative. The three branches of the legislature feem to treat their feparate rights and interests as the Roman Triumvirs did their friends. They reciprocally facrifice them to the animolities of each other, and establish a detestable union among themselves, upon the ruin of the laws and liberty of the commonwealth.

THROUGH the whole proceedings of the house of commons in this session, there is an apparent, a palpable consciousness of guilt, which has prevented their daring to assert their own dignity, where it has been immediately and grossly attacked. In the course of Doctor Musgrave's examination, he said every thing that can be conceived mortifying to individuals, or offensive to the house. They voted his information frivolous, but they were awed by his firm-

^{*} The man who resists and overcomes this iniquitous power, assumed by the lords, must be supported by the whole people. We have the laws on our side, and want nothing but an intrepid leader. When such a man stands forth, let the nation look to it. It is not his cause, but our own.

firmness a integrity, and funk under it . The terms, in which the fale of a patent to Mr. Hine were communicated to the public, naturally called for a parliamentary enquiry. The integrity of the house of commons was directly impeached; but they had not courage to move in their own vindication, because the enquiry would have been fatal to Colonel Burgoyne, and the Duke of Grafton. When Sir George Savile branded them with the name of traitors to their constituents, when the Lord Mayor, the Sheriffs, and Mr. Trecothick, expressly avowed and maintained every part of the city remonstrance, why did they tamely submit to be infulted? Why did they not immediately expel these refractory members? Conscious of the motives, on which they had acted, they prudently preferred infamy to danger, and were better prepared to meet the contempt, than to rouze the indignation of the whole people. Had they expelled those five members, the confequences of the new doctrine of incapacitation would have come immediately home to every man. The truth of it would then have been fairly fried, without any reference to Mr. Wilkes's private character, or the dignity of the house, or the obstinacy of one particular county. These topics, I know, have had their weight with men, who affecting a character of moderation, in reality confult nothing but their immediate ease; -who are weak enough to acquiefce under a flagrant violation of the laws, when it does not directly touch themselves, and care not what injustice is practifed upon a man, whose moral character they piously think themselves obliged to condemn. In any other circumstances, the house of commons must have forfeited all credit and dignity, if after fuch gross provocation, they had permitted those five gentlemen to fit any longer among them. We should then have seen and felt the operation of a precedent, which is represented to be perfectly barren and harmless. But there is a set of men in this country, whose understandings measure the violation of law by the magnitude of the inflance, not by the important consequences, which flow directly from the principle, and the minister, I presume, did not think it fafe to quicken their apprehensions too foon. Had Mr. Hampden reasoned and acted like the moderate men of these days, instead of hazarding his whole fortune in a law-fuit with the crown, he would have quietly paid the twenty shillings demanded of him, -the Stuart family would probably have continued upon the throne, and, at this moment, the imposition of ship-money would have been an acknowledged prerogative of the crown.

^{*} The examination of this firm, honest man, is printed for Almen. The reader will find it a most curious, and a most interesting tract. Doctor Muserave, with no other support but truth, and his own firm-sels, resisted, and overcame the whole house of commons.

WHAT then has been the business of the session, after voting the supplies, and confirming the determination of the Middlesex election? The extraordinary prorogation of the Irish parliament, and the just discontents of that kingdom, have been passed by without notice. Neither the general situation of our Colonies, nor that particular distress which forced the inhabitants of Boston to take up arms in their defence, have been thought worthy of a moment's consideration. In the repeal of those acts, which were most offensive to America, the parliament have done every thing, but remove the offence. They have relinquished the revenue, but judiciously take care to preserve the contention. It is not pretended that the continuation of the tea duty is to produce any direct benefit whatsoever to the mother country. What is it then but an odious, unprofitable exertion of a speculative right, and fixing a badge of slavery upon the Americans, without service to their masters? But it has pleased God to give us a ministry and a parliament, who are neither to be persuaded by argument, nor instructed by experience.

LORD North, I presume, will not claim an extraordinary merit from any thing he has done this year in the improvement or application of the revenue. A great operation, directed to an important object, though it should fail of success, marks the genius and elevates the character of a minister. A poor contracted understanding deals in little schemes, which dishonour him if they fail, and do him no credit if they fucceed. Lord North had fortunately the means in his possession of reducing all the four per cents at once. The failure of his first enterprize in finance is not half so difgraceful to his reputation as a minister, as the enterprize itself is injurious Instead of striking one decisive to the public. blow, which would have cleared the market at once, upon terms proportioned to the price of the four per cents fix weeks ago, he has tampered with a pitiful portion of a commodity, which ought never to have been touched but in grofs;he has given notice to the holders of that stock, of a defign formed by government to prevail upon them them to hold up and inhance the price;—so that the plan of reducing the sour per cents must either be dropped entirely, or continued with an increasing disadvantage to the public. The minister's sagacity has served to raise the value of the thing he means to purchase, and to sink that of the three per cents, which it is his purpose to sell. In effect, he has contrived to make it the interest of the proprietor of sour per cents to sell out and buy three per cents in the market, rather than subscribe his stock upon any terms, that can possibly be offered by government.

THE state of the nation leads us naturally to confider the fituation of the King. The prorogation of parliament has the effect of a temporary diffolution. The odium of measures adopted by the collective body fits lightly upon the feparate members, who composed it. They retire into summer quarters, and rest from the disgraceful labours of the campaign. But as for the Sovereign, it is not fo with him. He has a permanent existence in this country; He cannot withdraw himself from the complaints, the discontents, the reproaches of his fubjects. They purfue him to his retirement, and invade his domestic happiness, when no address can be obtained from an obsequious parliament to encourage or confole him. In other times, the interest of the King and people of England was, as it ought to be, entirely the fame. A new fystem has not only been adopted in fact, but professed upon principle. Ministers are no longer the public servants of the state, but the private domestics of the Sovereign.

reign. * One particular class of men are permitted to call themselves the King's friends, as if the body of the people were the King's enemies; or as if his Majesty looked for a resource or consolation, in the attachment of a few favourities, against the general contempt and detestation of his subjects. Edward, and Richard the fecond, made the fame diffinction between the collective body of the people, and a contemptible party who furrounded the throne. The event of their mistaken conduct might have been a warning to their fuccessors. Yet the errors of those princes were not without excuse. They had as many false friends, as our present gracious Sovereign, and infinitely greater temptations to feduce them. They were neither fober, religious, nor demure. Intoxicated with pleasure, they wasted their inheritance in pursuit of it. Their lives were like a rapid torrent, brilliant in prospect, though useless or dangerous in its course. In the dull, unanimated existence of other princes, we see nothing but a fickly, flagnant water, which taints the atmosphere without fertilizing the foil.-The morality of a King is not to be measured by vulgar rules. His fituation is fingular. There are faults which do him honour, and virtues that difgrace him. A faultless, insipid equality in his character, is nejther capable of vice nor virtue in the extreme; but it fecures his fubmission to those persons, whom he has been accustomed to respect, and makes him a dangerous instrument of their ambition. Secluded from the world, attached from his infancy to one set of persons, and one set of ideas, he can neither open his heart to new connexions, nor his mind to better information. A character of this sort is the soil sittest to produce that obstinate bigotry in politics and religion, which begins with a meritorious facrifice of the understanding, and finally conducts the monarch and the martyr to the block.

Damenant.

^{* &}quot;An ignorant, mercenary, and servile crew; unanimous in evil, diligent in mischief, variable in principles, constant to flattery, talkers for liberty, but slaves to power; -stilling themselves the court party, and the prince's only friend:

AT any other period, I doubt not, the scandalous disorders, which have been introduced into the government of all the dependencies in the Empire, would have rouzed the attention of the public. The odious abuse and prostitution of the prerogative at home, -the unconflitutional employment of the military,—the arbitrary fines and commitments by the house of lords, and court of king's bench; -the mercy of a chaste and pious Prince extended chearfully to a wilful murderer, because that murderer is the brother of a common proftitute *, would, I think, at any other time, have excited universal indignation. But the daring attack upon the constitution, in the Middlesex election, makes us callous and indifferent to inferior grievances. No man regards an eruption upon the furface, when the noble parts are invaded, and he feels a mortification approaching to his heart. The free election of our representatives in parliament comprehends, because it is, the source and security of every right and privilege of the English nation. The ministry have realised the compendious ideas of Caligula. They know that the liberty, the laws, and property of an Englishman have in truth but one neck, and that to violate the freedom of election strikes deeply at them all.

JUNIUS.

LETTER XL.

TO LORD NORTH.

22 Aug. 1770. MY LORD,

N TR. Luttrell's services were the chief support VI and ornament of the Duke of Grafton's administration. The honour of rewarding them was referved for your Lordship. The Duke, it seems, had contracted an obligation he was ashamed to acknowledge, and unable to acquit. You, my Lord, had no scruples. You accepted the succession with all its incumbrances, and have paid Mr. Luttrell his legacy, at the hazard of ruining the estate.

WHEN this accomplished youth declared himself the champion of government, the world was bufy in enquiring what honours or emoluments could be a sufficient recompence, to a young man of his rank and fortune, for submitting to mark his entrance into life with the univerfal contempt and detestation of his country.-His noble father had not been fo precipitate.-To vacate his feat in parliament;-to intrude upon a county in which he had no interest or connexion; -to possess himself of another man's right, and to maintain it in defiance of public shame as well as justice, bespoke a degree of zeal or of depravity, which all the favour of a pious Prince could hardly requite. I protest, my Lord, there is in this young man's conduct, a strain of prostitution, which, for its singularity, I cannot but admire. He has discovered a new line in the human character;—he has degraded even the name of Luttrell, and gratified his father's most fanguine expectations.

THE Duke of Grafton, with every possible difposition to parronife this kind of merit, was contented with pronouncing Colonel Luttrell's panegyric. The gallant spirit, the disinterested zeal of the young adventurer, were echoed through the house of lords. His Grace repeatedly pledged himfelf to the house, as an evidence of the purity of his friend Mr. Luttrell's intentions; -that he had engaged without any prospect of personal benefit, and that the idea of compensation would mortally offend him *. The noble Duke could hardly be in earnest; but he had lately quitted his employment, and began to think it necessary to take some care of his reputation. At that very moment the Irish he gociation was probably begun.-Come forward, thou worthy representative of Lord Bute, and tell this infulted country, who advised the King to appoint Mr. Luttrell, ADJUTANT-GENERAL to the army in Ireland. By what management was Colonel Cuninghame prevailed on to refign his employment, and the obsequious Gilborne to accept of a pension for the government of Kinfale | ?- Was it an original flipulation with the Princess of Wales, or does he owe his preferment to your Lordship's partiality, or to the Duke of Bedford's friendship? My Lord, though it may not be possible to trace this measure to its fource, we can follow the stream, and warn the country of its approaching destruction. The English nation must be rouzed, and put upon its guard. Mr. Luttrell has already shewn us how far he may be trufted, whenever an open attack is to be made upon the liberties of this country. I do. not doubt that there is a deliberate plan formed.— Your Lordship best knows by whom; -the corruption of the legislative body on this fide—a military force on the other-and then, Farewell to England! It is impossible that any minister shall dare to advise the King to place fuch a man as Luttrell in the confidential post of Adjutant-general, if there were not fome fecret purpose in view, which only such a man as Lurell is fit to promote. The infult offered to the army in general is as grofs as the outrage intended to the people of England. What! Lieutenant-colonel Luttrell, Adjutant-general of an army of fixteen thousand men! one would think his Majesty's campaigns at Blackheath and Wimbledon might have taught him better .- I cannot help wishing General Harvey joy of a colleague, who does fo much honour to the employment. - But, my to induce him to refign to Luttrell. Cuninghame treats the offer with contempt. What's to be done? poor Gibborne muit move once more.—He accepts of a pension of good, a year, until a government of greater value shall become vacant. Colonel Cuninghame is made Governor of Kinsale; and Luttrell, at last, for whom the whole machinery is put in motion, becomes Adjurant-general, and in effect takes the command of the army in Ireland.

[•] He now fays that his great object is the rank of Colonel, and that he will have it.

[†] This infamous transfection ought to be explained to the public Colonel Gifborne was quarter-maffer-general in Ireland. Lord Townsherd persuades him to refign to a Scotch officer, one Fract, and gives him the government of Kinsale — Colonel Cuninghame was Adjutant-general in Ireland. Lo d Townshend effects him a peasing.

Lord, this measure is too daring to pass unnoticed, too dangerous to be received with indifference or submission. You shall not have time to new-model the Irish army. They will not submit to be garbled by Colonel Luttrell. As a mischief to the English constitution, (for he is not worth the name of enemy) they already detest him. As a boy, impudently thrust over their heads, they will receive him with indignation and contempt.—As for you, my Lord, who perhaps are no more than the blind, unhappy instrument of Lord Bute and her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, be assured that you shall be called upon to answer for the advice, which has been given, and either discover your accomplices, or fall a facrifice to their security.

JUNIUS.

LETTER XLI.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE LORD MANSFIELD.

MY LORD,

14 Nov. 1770.

THE appearance of this letter will attract the curiofity of the public, and command even your Lordship's attention. I am considerably in your debt, and shall endeavour, once for all, to balance the account. Accept of this address, my Lord, as a prologue to more important scenes, in which you will probably be called upon to act or suffer.

You will not question my veracity, when I affure you that it has not been owing to any particular respect for your person that I have abstained from you solong. Besides the distress and danger with which the press is threatened, when your lordship is party, and the party is to be judge, I confess I have been deterred by the dissiculty of the task. Our language has no term of reproach, the mind has no idea of detestation, which has not already been happily applied to you, and exhausted.—Ample justice has been done by abler pens than mine to the separate merits of your life and character. Let it be my humble office to collect the scattered sweets, till their united virtue tortures the sense.

PERMIT me to begin with paying a just tribute to Scotch fincerity, wherever I find it. I own I am not apt to confide in the professions of gentlemen of that country, and when they smile, I feel an involuntary emotion to guard myself against mischief. With this general opinion of an ancient nation, I always thought it much to your lordship's honour, that, in your earlier days, you were but little infected with the prudence of your country. You had some original attachments, which you took every proper opportunity to acknowledge. The liberal spirit of youth prevailed over your native difcretion. Your zeal in the cause of an unhappy prince was expressed with the fincerity of wine, and some of the folemnities of religion.* This I conceive, is the most amiable point of view, in which your character has appeared. Like an honest man you took that part in politics, which might have been expected from your birth, education, country and con-

^{*} This man was always a rank Jacobite. Lord Ravensworth produced the most fatisfactory Evidence of his having frequently drank the Pretender's health upon his knees.

nexions. There was fomething generous in your attachment to the banished house of Stuart. lament the mistakes of a good man, and do not begin to detest him until he affects to renounce his principles. Why did you not adhere to the loyalty you once professed? Why did you not follow the example of your worthy brother? * With him, you might have shared in the honour of the Pretender's confidence-with him, you might have preferved the integrity of your character, and England, I think, might have spared you without regret. Your friends will fay, perhaps, that altho' you deferted the fortune of your liege lord, you have adhered firmly to the principles which drove his father from the throne; -that without openly supporting the person, you have done essential service to the cause, and confoled yourfelf for the loss of a favourite family by reviving and establishing the maxims of their government. This is the way, in which a Scotchman's understanding corrects the error of his heart. -My lord, I acknowledge the truth of the defence. and can trace it through all your conduct. I fee through your whole life, one uniform plan to enlarge the power of the crown, at the expence of the liberty of the subject. To this object, your thoughts, words and actions have been conflantly directed. In contempt or ignorance of the common law of England, you have made it your fludy to introduce into the court, where you prefide, maxims of jurifprudence unknown to Englishmen. The Roman code, the law of nations, and the opinion of foreign civilians,

^{*} Confidential Secretary to the late Pretender. This circumstance confirmed the friendship between the brothers.

civilians, are your perpetual theme; -but whoever heard you mention Magna Charta or the Bill of Rights with approbation or respect? By such treacherous arts, the noble simplicity and free spirit of our Saxon laws were first corrupted. The Norman conquest was not compleat, until Norman lawyers had introduced their laws, and reduced flavery to a System .- This one leading principle directs your interpretation of the laws, and accounts for your treatment of juries. It is not in political questions only (for there the courtier might be forgiven) but let the cause be what it may, your understanding is equally on the rack, either to contract the power of the jury, or to millead their judgment. For the truth of this affertion, I appeal to the doctrine you delivered in Lord Grofvenor's cause. An action for criminal conversation being brought by a peer against a prince of the blood, you were daring enough to tell the jury that, in fixing the damages, they were to pay no regard to the quality or fortune of the parties;that it was a trial between A. and B .- that they were to confider the offence in a moral light only, and give no greater damages to a peer of the realm, than to the meanest mechanic. I shall not attempt to refute a doctrine, which, if it was meant for law, carries falshood and absurdity upon the face of it; but, if it was meant for a declaration of your political creed, is clear and confiftent. Under an arbitrary government, all ranks and distinctions are confounded. The honour of a nobleman is no more confidered than the reputation of a peafant, for, with different liveries, they are equally flaves.

EVEN in matters of private property, we see the same byass and inclination to depart from the decisions of your predecessors, which you certainly ought to receive as evidence of the common law. Instead of those certain, positive rules, by which the judgment of a court of law should invariably be determined, you have fondly introduced your own unfettled notions of equity and substantial justice. Decisions given upon such principles do not alarm the public fo much as they ought, because the confequence and tendency of each particular instance, is not observed or regarded. In the mean time the practice gains ground; the court of King's Bench becomes a court of equity, and the judge, instead of consulting strictly the law of the land, refers only to the wisdom of the court, and to the purity of his own conscience. The name of Mr. Justice Yates, will naturally revive in your mind fome of those emotions of fear and deteftation, with which you always beheld him. That great lawyer, that honest man, faw your whole conduct in the light that I do. After years of ineffectual refistance to the pernicious. principles introduced by your Lordship, and uniformly supported by your humll friends upon the bench, he determined, to quit a court, whose proceedings and decisions he could neither assent to with honour, nor oppose with success.

* THE injustice done to an Individual is sometimes of service to the public. Facts are apt to alarm us more than the most dangerous principles. The sufferings and sirmness of a Printer have roused the public

^{*} The oppression of an obscure individual gave birth to the samous Habeas Corpus Act of 31. Car. 2. which is frequently considered as another Magna Charta of the Kingdom. Blackstone, 3, 135.

public attention. You knew and felt that your conduct would not bear a parliamentary inquiry, and you hoped to escape it by the meanest, the basest facrifice of dignity and confiftency, that ever was made by a great magistrate. Where was your firmness, where was that vindictive spirit, of which we have feen so many examples, when a man so inconsiderable as Bingley, could force you to confess, in the face of this country, that, for two years together, you had illegally deprived an English sabject of his liberty. and that he had triumphed over you at last? Yet I own, my Lord, that your's is not an uncommon cha-Women, and menlike woman, are timid, vindictive, and irrefolute. Their passions counterast each other, and make the same creature, at one moment hateful, at another contemptible. I fancy. my Lord some time will elapse before you venture to commit another Englishman for refusing to answer interrogatories. *

THE doctrine you have constantly delived, in cases of libel, is another powerful evidence of a settled plan to contract the legal power of juries, and to draw questions, inseparable from sact, within the arbitrium of the court. Here, my Lord, you have fortune of your side. When you invade the province of the jury, in matter of libel, you, in essect, attack the liberty of the press, and with a single stroke, wound

^{*} Bingley was committed for contempt in not submitting to be examined: Hs lay in prison two years, until the Crown thought the matter might occasion some serious complaint, and therefore he was let out, in the same contumelious state he had been put in, with all his sins about him, unannointed and unannealed.—There was much coquetry between the Court and the Attorney General, about who should undergo the ridicule of letting him escape.—Vide another Letter to Almon, p. 189.

two of your greatest enemies .- In some instances you have succeeded, because jurymen are too often ignorant of their own rights, and too apt to be awed by the authority of a chief justice. In other criminal profecutions, the malice of the defign is confessedly as much the subject of consideration to a jury, as the certainty of the fact. If a different doctrine prevails in the case of libels, why should it not extend to all criminal cases? - Why not to capital offences? I fee no reason (and I dare say you will agree with me that there is no good one) why the life of the fubicat should be better protected against you, than his liberty or property. Why should you enjoy the full power of pillory, fine, and imprisonment, and not be indulged with hanging or transportation? With your Lordship's fertile genius and merciful disposition, I can conceive fuch an exercise of the power you have, as could hardly be aggravated by that which you have not.

But, my Lord, fince you have laboured, (and not unfuceelsfully) to destroy the substance of the trial, why should you suffer the form of the verdist to remain? Why force twelve honest men, in palpable violation of their oaths, to pronounce their fellow-sabject a guilty man, when, almost at the same moment, you sorbid their enquiring into the only circumstance, which in the eye of law and reason, constitutes guilt—the malignity or innocence of his intentions?—But I understand your Lordship.—It you could succeed in making the trial by jury uteless and ridiculous, you might then with greater safety introduce a bill into parliament for enlarging the jurisdiction of the court, and extending your savourite trial by interrogatories to every question, in which the life or liberty of an Englishman is concerned.*

Your charge to the jury, in the projecution against Almon and Woodfall, contradicts the highest legal authorities, as well as the plainest dictates of reason. In Miller's cause, and still more expressly in that of Baldwin, you have proceeded a step farther, and grossly contradicted yourself .-- You may know perhaps, though I do not mean to infult you by an appeal to your experience, that the language of truth is uniform and confident. To depart from it safely, requires memory and discretion. In the two last trials, your charge to the jury began, as usual, with your affuring them that they had nothing to do with the law, -that they were to find the bare fact, and not concern themselves about the legal inferences drawn from it, or the degree of the defendant's guilt, -Thus far you were confident with your former practice. - But how will you account for the conclufion? You told the jury that, " if, after all, they " would take upon themselves to determine the law, " they might do it, but they must be very sure that " they determined according to law, for it touched " their consciences, and they acted at their peril." -If I understand your first proposition, you meant

* The philosophical poet, doth notably describe the damnable and damned proceedings of the Judge of Hell,

" Gnoffius hac Rhadamanthus habet duriffima regna,

" Caffigatque, auditique dolos, subigitque fateri."

First he punisheth and then he heaveth: and lastly compelleth to confess, and makes and mars laws at his pleasure; like as the Centurion, in the holy history did to St. Paul, for the text saith, "Centurio apprehendi Paulum justic, & se catenis eligari, et tunc INTERRO-GABAT, quis suisset, & quid secisset;" but good Judges and Justices, abhor these Courses. Coke 2. Inst. 55.

to affirm, that the jury were not competent judges of the law in the criminal case of a libel—that it did not fall within their jurisdiction; and that, with respect to them, the malice or innocence of the dedefendant's intentions would be a question coram non judice.-But the fecond proposition clears away your own difficulties, and restores the jury to all their judicial capacities. * You make the competence of the court to depend upon the legality of the decision. In the first instance you deny the power absolutely. In the fecond, you admit the power, provided it be legally exercised. Now, my Lord, without pretending to reconcile the diffinctions of Westminster-hall with the simple information of common-lense, or the integrity of fair argument, I shall be understood by your Lordship, when I affert that, if a jury or any other court of judicature (for jurors are judges) have no right to entertain a cause, or question of law, it fignifies nothing whether their decision be or be not according to law. Their decision is in itself a mere nullity: the parties are not bound to fubmit to it: and, if the jury run any risque of punishment, it is not for pronouncing a corrupt or illegal verdict, but for the illegality of meddling with a point, on which they have no legal authority to decide +.

I CAN-

^{*} Directly the reverse of the doctrine he constantly maintained in the house of lords and essewhere, upon the decision of the Middleiex elect. He invariably afferted that the decision must be legal, because the court was competent; and never could be prevailed on to enter farther into the question.

⁺ These iniquitous prosecutions cost the best of princes six thousand rounds, and ended in the total deseat and disgrace of the prosecutors. In the course of one of them Judge Aston had the unparalleled impadence to tell Mr. Morris (a gentleman of unquestionable honour and

I CANNOT quit this subject without reminding your Lordship of the name of Mr. Benson. Without offering any legal objection, you ordered a special juryman to be fet afide in a caufe, where the King was profecutor. The novelty of the fact required an explanation. Will you condescend to tell the world by what law or custom you were authorised to make a peremptory challenge of a juryman? The parties indeed have this power, and perhaps your Lordship, having accustomed yourself to unite the characters of judge and party, may claim it in virtue of the new capacity you have assumed, and profit by your own wrong. The time, within which you might have been punished for this daring attempt to pack a jury, is I fear, elapsed; but no length of time shall erase the record of it.

The mischiefs you have done this country, are not confined to your interpretation of the laws. You are a minister, my Lord, and, as such, have long been consulted. Let us candidly examine what use you have made of your ministerial influence. I will not descend to little matters, but come at once to those important points, on which your resolution was waited for, on which the expectation of your opinion kept a great part of the nation in suspence. A constitutional question arises upon a declaration of the law of parliament, by which the freedom of election, and the birthright of the subject were supposed to have been invaded.—The King's servants are accused of violating the constitution.—The nation is in a ferment.—The ablest men of all par-integrity, and who was then giving his evidence on oath) that be should pay very little regard to any affidavit hesbould make.

ties engage in the question, and exert their utmost abilities in the discussion of it .- What part has the honest Lord Mansfield acted? As an eminent judge of the law, his opinion would have been refpected .- As a peer he had a right to demand an audience of his Sovereign, and inform him that his ministers were pursuing unconstitutional measures. -Upon other occasions, my Lord, you have no difficulty in finding your way to the closet. The pretended neutrality of belonging to no party, will not fave your reputation. In questions merely political, an honest man may stand neuter. But the laws and conflitution are the general property of the fubje&; not to defend is to relinquish; -and who is there to fenfeless as to renounce his share in a common benefit, unless he hopes to profit by a new divifion of the spoil? As a lord of parliament, you were repeatedly called upon to condem nor defend the new law declared by the house of commons. You affected to have scruples, and every expedient was attempted to remove them .- The question was proposed and urged to you in a thousand different shapes. -Your prudence still supplied you with evasion ;your refolution was invincible. For my own part, I am not anxious to penetrate this folemn fecret. I care not to whose wisdom it is intrusted, nor how foon you carry it with you to the grave *. You have betrayed your opinion by the very care you have taken to conceal it. It is not from Lord Manf-

^{*} He faid in the house of lords, that he believed he should carry his opinion with him to the grave. It was afterwards reported that he intrusted it, in special considence, to the ingenious Duke of Cumberland.

field that we expect any referve in declaring his real fentiments in favour of government, or in opposition to the people; nor is it difficult to account for the motions of a timid, dishonest heart, which neither has virtue enough to acknowledge truth, nor courage to contradict it .- Yet you continue to support an administration which you know is universally odious, and which, on fome occasions, you yourself speak of with contempt. You would feign be thought to take no share in government, while, in reality, you are the main fpring in the machine.-Here too we trace the little, prudential policy of a Scotchman. -Instead of acting that open, generous part, which becomes your rank and station, you meanly skulk into the closet, and give your fovereign such advice, as you have not spirit to avow or defend. You fecretly engross the power, while you decline the title of minister; and though you dare not be Chancellor, you know how to fecure the emoluments of the office. - Are the feals to be for ever in commission, that you may enjoy five thousand pounds a year?-I beg pardon, my Lord ;—your fears have interpofed at last, and forced you to refign. - The odium of continuing speaker of the house of lords, upon such terms was too formidable to be refifted. multitude of bad passions are forced to submit to a constitutional infirmity! But though you have relinquished the falary, you still assume the rights of a minister .- Your conduct, it seems, must be defended in parliament.—For what other purpose is your wretched friend, that miserable serjeant, posted to the house of commons? Is it in the abilities of Mr. Leigh to defend the great Lord Mansfield?-Or is he only the Punch of the puppet-thew, to speak as he is prompted, by the CHIEF JUGGLER behind the curtain *?

In public affairs, my Lord, cunning, let it be ever so well wrought, will not conduct a man honourably through life. Like bad money, it may be current for a time, but it will foon be cried down, It cannot confift with a liberal foirit, though it be fometimes united with extraordinary qualifications. When I acknowledge your abilities, you may believe I am fincere. I feel for human nature, when I fee a man, fo gifted as you are, descend to such vile practice.-Yet do not fuffer your vanity to confole you too foon. Believe me, my good Lord, you are not admired in the same degree, in which you are detefted. It is only the partiality of your friends, that balances the defects of your heart with the fuperiority of your understanding. No learned man, even among your own tribe, thinks you qualified to prefide in a court of common law. Yet it is confessed that, under Justinian, you might have made an incomparable Prator .- It is remarkable enough, but I hope not ominous, that the laws you understand best, and the judges you affect to admire most, flourished in the decline of a great empire, and are supposed to have contributed to its fall.

HERE, my Lord, it may be proper for us to paufe together.—It is not for my own fake that I wish you to consider the delicacy of your situation.

This paragraph gagged poor Leigh. I really am concerned for the man, and with it were possible to open his mouth—He is a very pretty crate.

Beware

Beware how you indulge the first emotions of your resentment. This paper is delivered to the world, and cannot be recalled. The persecution of an innocent printer cannot alter sacts, nor resute arguments.—Do not surnish me with farther materials against yoursels.—An honest man, like the true religion, appeals to the understanding, or modestly consides in the internal evidence of his conscience. The impostor employs force instead of argument, imposes silence where he cannot convince, and propagates his character by the sword.

JUNIUS.

LETTER XLII

TO THE PRINTER OF THE FUBLIC AD-

SIR, 30 Jan. 1770.

have been constantly employed, we shall have no reason to be surprised at any condition of disgrace, to which the once-respected name of Englishmen may be degraded. His Majesty has no cares, but such as concern the laws and constitution of this country. In his royal breast there is no room left for resentment, no place for hostile sentiments against the natural enemies of his crown. The system of government is uniform.—Violence and oppression at home can only be supported by treachery and submission abroad. When the civil rights of the people are daringly invaded on one side, what have we to expect, but that their political rights should be deserted and betrayed, in the fame proportion, on the other? The plan of domeffic policy, which has been invariably purfued, from the moment of his prefent Majesty's accession. engroffes all the attention of his fervants. They know that the fecurity of their places depends upon their maintaining, at any hazard, the fecret fustem of the closet. A foreign war might embarrafs, an unfavourable event might ruin the minister, and defeat the deep-laid scheme of policy, to which he and his affociates owe their employments. Rather than fuffer the execution of that scheme to be delayed or interrupted, the King has been advised to make a public furrender, a folemn facrifice, in the face of all Europe, not only of the interests of his subjects, but of his own personal reputation, and of the dignity of that crown, which his predecessors have worn with honour. These are strong terms, Sir, but they are supported by fact and argument.

THE King of Great-Britain had been for some years in possession of an island, to which, as the ministry themselves have repeatedly afferted, the Spaniards had no claim of right. The importance of the place is not in question. If it were, a better judgment might be formed of it from the opinion of Lord Anfon and Lord Egmont, and from' the anxiety of the Spaniards, than from any fallacious infinuations thrown out by men, whose inteseft is is to undervalue that property, which they are determined to relinquish. The pretentions of Spain were a fubject of negociation between the two courts. They had been discussed, but not admitted. The King of Spain, in these circumstances, bids adieu to amicable negociation, and appeals directly directly to the fword. The expedition against Port Egmont does not appear to have been a fudden illconcerted enterprise. It seems to have been conducted not only with the usual military precautions, but in all the forms and ceremonies of war. A frigate was first employed to examine the strength of the place. A meffage was then fent, demanding immediate possession, in the Catholic King's name, and ordering our people to depart. At last a military force appears, and compels the garrison to furrender. A formal capitulation enfues, and his Majefty's ship, which might at least have been permitted to bring home his troops immediately, is detained in port twenty days, and her rudder forcibly taken away. This train of facts carries no appearance of the rashness or violence of a Spanish governor. On the contrary, the whole plan feems to have been formed and executed, in confequence of deliberate orders, and a regular instruction from the Spanish court. Mr. Bucarelli is not a pirate. nor has he been treated as fuch by those who employed him. I feel for the honour of a gentleman, when I affirm that our King owes him a fignal reparation.-Where will the humiliation of this country end! A King of Great Britain, not contented with placing himfelf upon a level with a Spanish governor, descends so low as to do a notorious injustice to that governor. As a salvo for his own reputation, he has been advised to traduce the character of a brave officer, and to treat him as a common robber, when he knew with certainty that Mr. Bucarelli had acted in obedience to his orders, and had done no more than his duty. Thus it happens pens in private life, with a man who has no spirit nor sense of honour.—One of his equals orders a servant to strike him.—Instead of returning the blow to the master, his courage is contented with throwing an aspersion, equally take and public, upon the character of the servant.

THIS short recapitulation was necessary to introduce the confideration of his Majesty's speech, of 13 November, 1770, and the subsequent measures of government. The excessive caution, with which the speech was drawn up, had impressed upon me an early conviction, that no ferious refentment was thought of, and that the conclusion of the business, whenever it happened, must, in some degree, be difhonourable to England. There appears through the whole speech a guard and referve in the choice of expression, which shews how careful the ministry were not to embarrafs their future projects by any firm or spirited declaration from the throne. When all hopes are loft, his Majesty tells his parliament. that he is preparing, -not for barbarous war, but (with all his mother's foftness,) for a different Situation .- An open hostility, authorised by the Catholic King, is called an all of a governor. This act, to avoid the mention of a regular fiege and furrender, vasses under the piratical description of seizing by force; and the thing taken is described, not as a part of the King's territory or proper dominion, but merely as a possession, a word expressly chosen in contradiction to, and exclusion of the idea of right, and to prepare us for a future furrender both of the right and of the possession. Yet this speech, Sir, cautious and equivocal as it is, cannot, by any fophistry, phistry, be accommodated to the measures, which have fince been adopted. It feemed to promife. that whatever might be given up by fecret stipulation, some care would be taken to save appearances to the public. The event shews us, that to depart, in the minutest article, from the nicety and strictness of punctilio, is as dangerous to national honour, as to female virtue. The woman, who admits of one familiarity, feldom knows where to flop, or what to refuse; and when the counsels of a great country give way in a fingle inflance, -when they once are inclined to submission, every step accelerates the rapidity of the descent. The ministry themselves, when they framed the speech, did not foresee, that they should ever accede to such an accommodation, as they have since advised their master to accept of.

THE King says, The honour of my crown and the rights of my people are deeply affected. The Spaniard, in his reply, says, I give you back possession, but I adhere to my claim of prior right, reserving the assertion of it for a more favourable opportunity.

THE speech says, I made an immediate demand of satisfaction, and, if that fails, I am prepared to do myself justice. This immediate demand must have been sent to Madrid on the 12th of September, or in a few days after. It was certainly refused, or evaded, and the King has not done himself justice.—When the first magistrate speaks to the nation, some care should be taken of his apparent veracity.

THE speech proceeds to say, I shall not discontinue my preparations until I have received proper reparation for the injury. If this affurance may be relied on, what an enormous expence is entailed, fine die, upon
Vol. II. G

this unhappy country! Restitution of a possession, and reparation of a injury are as different in substance, as they are in language. The very act of restitution may contain, as in this instance it palpably does, a shameful aggravation of the injury. A man of spirit does not measure the degrees of an injury by the mere positive damage he has sustained. He considers the principle on which it is sounded; he resents the superiority asserted over him; and rejects with indignation the claim of right, which would force him to acknowledge.

THE motives, on which the Catholic King makes restitution, are, if possible, more insolent and disgraceful to our Sovereign, than even the declaratory condition annexed to it. After taking four months to consider, whether the expedition was undertaken by his own orders or not, he condescends to disavow the enterprize, and to restore the island, -not from any regard to justice ;- not from any regard he bears to his Britannic Majesty, but merely from the persuasion, in which he is, of the pacific fentiments of the King of Great Britain .- At this rate, if our King had discovered the spirit of a man, - if he had made a peremptory demand of fatisfaction, the King of Spain would have given him a peremptory refufal But why this unreasonable, this ridiculous mention of the King of Great Britain's pacific intentions? Have they ever been in question? Was He the ag greffor? Does he attack foreign powers without provocation? Does he even refift, when he is infulted? No, Sir, if any ideas of strife or hostility have entered his royal mind, they have a very different direction.

rection. The enemies of England have nothing to

AFTER all, Sir, to what kind of difavowal has the King of Spain at last consented? Supposing it made in proper time, it should have been accompanied with instant restitution; and if Mr. Bucarelli acted without orders he deserved death. Now, Sir, instead of immediate restitution, we have a four months negociation, and the officer, whose act is disavowed, returns to court, and is loaded with honours.

Ir the actual fituation of Europe be confidered, the treachery of the King's fervants, particularly of Lord North, who takes the whole upon himfelf, wil appear in the ftrongest colours of aggravation. Our allies were mafters of the Mediterranean. The King of France's prefent aversion from war, and the distraction of his affairs are notorious. He is now in a flate of war with his people. In vain did the Catholic King folicit him to take part in the quarrel against us. His finances were in the last disorder. and it was probable that his troops might find fufficient employment at home. In these circumstances. we might have dictated the law to Spain. There are no terms, to which fhe might not have been compelled to submit. At the worst, a war with Spain alone carries the fairest promise of advantage. One good effect at least would have been immediarely produced by it. The defertion of France would have irritated her ally, and in all probability have dissolved the family compact. The scene is now fatally changed. The advantage is thrown away. The most favourable opportunity is lost .-Hereafter we shall know the value of it. When the French King is reconciled to his subjects; when Spain has compleated her preparations; when the collected strength of the house of Bourbon attacks us at once, the King himfelf will be able to determine upon the wisdom or imprudence of his present conduct. As far as the probability of argument extends, we may fafely pronounce, that a conjuncture, which threatens the very being of this country, has been wilfully prepared and forwarded by our own ministry. How far the people may be animated to refistance under the present administration, I know not; but this I know with certainty. that, under the present administration, or if any thing like it should continue, it is of very little moment whether we are a conquered nation or not *.

HAVING travelled thus far in the high road of matter of fact, I may now be permitted to wander a little into the field of imagination. Let us banish from our minds the persuasion that these events have really happened in the reign of the best of ^{*} The King's acceptance of the Spanish Ambassador's declaration, is drawn up in barbarous French, and figned by the Earl of Rochford. This diplomatic Lord has spent his life in the study and practice of Etiquetter, and is supposed to be a prosound master of the ceremonies. I will not infult him by any reference to grammar or common fense, if he were even acquainted with the common forms of his office, I should think him as well qualified for it, as any man in his Majefly's service. The reader is requested to observe Lord Rochford's method of authenticating a public instrument. " En for de 44 quoi, moi fouffigne, un des principaux Secretaires d' Etat S. M. B. " ai figne la presente de ma fignature ordinaire, et icelle fait appoier " le cachet de nos Armee." In three lines there are no less than feven faile concords. But the man does not even know the stile of his office; If he had known it, he would have faid, " nous, fouffigne " Secretaire d' Etat de S. M. B. avons figne, &. princes.

princes. Let us confider them as nothing more than the materials of a fable, in which we may conceive the Sovereign of some other country to be concerned. I mean to violate all the laws of probability, when I suppose that this imaginary King, after having voluntarily difgraced himself in the eyes of his subjects, might return to a sense of his dishonour; -that he might perceive the snare laid for him by his ministers, and feel a spark of shame kindling in his breast.—The part he must then be obliged to act, would overwhelm him with confusion. To his parliament he must say, I called you together to receive your advice, and have never asked your opinion .- To the merchant,-I have distreffed your commerce; I have dragged your seamen out of your ships, I have loaded you with a grievous weight of insurances. To the landholder, -I told you war was too probable, when I was determined to fubmit to any terms of accommodation; I extorted new taxes from you before it was possible they could be wanted, and am now unable to account for the application of them .- To the public creditor, -- I have delivered up your fortunes a prey to foreigners and to the vilest of your fellow-subjects. Perhaps this repenting Prince might conclude with one general acknowledgment to them all, -I have involved every rank of my subjects in anxiety and distress, and have nothing. to offer you in return, but the certainty of national dishonour, an armed truce, and peace without security.

Is these accounts were settled, there would still remain an apology to be made to his navy and to his army. To the first he would say, you were once the terror of the world. But go back to your har-bours. A man disconoured, as I am, has no use for your service. It is not probable that he would appear again before his soldiers, even in the pasific ceremony of a review*. But wherever he appeared, the humiliating confession would be extorted from him. I have received a blow,—and had not spirit to resent it. I demanded satisfaction, and have accepted a declaration, in which the right to strike me again is afferted and confirmed. His countenance at least would speak this language, and even his guards would blush for him.

Bur to return to our argument. - The ministry, it feems, are labouring to draw a line of distinction between the honour of the crown and the rights of the people. This new idea has yet been only started in discourse, for in effect both objects have been equally facrificed. I neither understand the distinction, nor what use the ministry propose to make of The King's honour is that of his people. Their real honour and real interest are the same .- I am not contending for a vain punctilio. A clear, unblemished character comprehends not only the integrity that will not offer, but the spirit that will not fubmit to an injury; and whether it belongs to an individual or to a community, it is the foundation of peace, of independence, and of fafety. Private credit is wealth; - public honour is fecurity. - The feather that adorns the royal bird, supports his flight. Strip him of his plumage and you fix him IUNIUS. to the earth.

[•] A Mistake. He appears before them every day, with the mark of a blow upon his face.—preh puder?

L E T-

LETTER XLIII.

TO THE PRINTER OF THE PUBLIC AD-

SIR, 6 Feb. 1771.

HOPE your correspondent Junius is better emapleyed than in answering or reading the criticisms of a news-paper. This is a task, from which, if he were inclined to submit to it, his friends ought to relieve him. Upon this principle, I shall undertake to answer Anti-Junius; more, I believe, to his conviction than to his satisfaction. Not daring to attack the main body of Junius's last letter, he triumphs in having, as he thinks, surprised an outpost, and cut off a detached argument, a mere straggling proposition. But even in this petty warfare, he shall find himself defeated.

Junius does not speak of the Spanish nation as the natural enemies of England. He applies that description with the strictest truth and justice, to the Spanish Court. From the moment, when a Prince of the House of Bourbon ascended that throne, their whole system of government was inverted and became hostile to this country. Unity of possession introduced a unity of positics, and Lewis the sourceenth had reason when he said to his grandson, "The Pyrenees are removed." The History of the present century is one continued confirmation of the prophecy.

THE Affertion "That violence and oppression at "home can only be supported by treachery and sub"mission abroad," is applied to a free people, whose rights are invaded, not to the government of a country, where despotic, or absolute power is confessedly vested in the prince; and with this application, the affertion is true. An absolute monarch having no points to carry at home, will naturally maintain the honour of his crown in all his transactions with foreign powers. But if we could funpose the Sovereign of a free nation, possessed with a defign to make himself absolute, he would be inconfident with himself if he suffered his projects to be interrupted or embarraffed by a foreign war : unless that war tended, as in some cases it might, to promote his principal design. Of the three exceptions to this general rule of conduct, (quoted by Anti-Junius) that of Oliver Cromwell is the only one in point. Harry the Eighth, by the submission of his parliament, was as absolute a prince as Lewis the Fourteenth. Queen Elizabeth's government was not oppressive to the people; and as to her foreign wars, it ought to be confidered that they were unavoidable. The national honour was not in queftion. She was compelled to fight in defence of her own person and of her title to the crown. In the common cause of selfish policy, Oliver Cromwell should have cultivated the friendship of foreign nowers, or at least have avoided disputes with them, the better to establish his tyranny at home. Had he been only a bad man, he would have facrificed the honour of the nation to the success of his domestic policy. But, with all his crimes, he had the spirit of an Englishman. The conduct of such a man must always be an exception to vulgar rules. He had abilities sufficient to reconcile contradictione, and to make a great nation at the same moment unhappy and formidable. If it were not for the respect I bear the minister, I could name a man, who, without one grain of understanding, can do half as much as Oliver Cromwell.

G 4. rights

WHETHER or no there be a fecret fystem in the closet, and what may be the object of it, are questions, which can only be determined by appearances, and on which every man must decide for himself.

THE whole plan of Junius's letter proves that he himself makes no distinction between the real honour of the crown and the real interest of the people. In the climax, to which your correspondent objects, Junius adopts the language of the Court, and, by that conformity, gives strength to his argument. He says that, "the King has not only fa-"crificed the interests of his people, but, (what was likely to touch him more nearly,) his personal reputation and the signity of his crown."

THE queries, put by Anti-funius, can only be answered by the ministry. Abandoned as they are, I sancy they will not confess that they have for so many years, maintained possession of another man's property. After admitting the affertion of the ministry—viz. that the Spaniards had no rightful claim, and after justifying them for saying so;—it is his business not mine, to give us some good reason for their suffering the pretensions of Spain to be a subject of negociation. He admits the sacts;—let him reconcile them if he can.

THE last paragraph brings us back to the origiual question, whether the Spanish declaration contains rains such a satisfaction as the King of Great Britain eaght to have accepted. This was the field, upon which he ought to have encountered Junius openly and fairly. But here he leaves the argument, as no longer defenfible. I shall therefore conclude with one general admonition to my fellow subjects: -that, when they hear these matters debated, they should not suffer themselves to be misled by general declamations upon the conveniences of peace, or the miferies of war. Between peace and war, abstractedly, there is not, there cannot be a question in the mind of a rational being. The real questions are, Have we any fecurity that the peace we have fo dearly purchased will last a twelvemonth? and, if not, -have we, or have we not, facrificed the fairest opportunity of making war with advantage?

PHILO JUNIUS.

LETTER XLIV.

TO THE PRINTER OF THE PUBLIC AD-

TO write for profit without taxing the press;
—to write for same and to be unknown;—to support the intrigues of saction and to be disowned, as a dangerous auxiliary, by every party in the kingdom, are contradictions, which the minister must reconcile, before I forfeit my credit with the public. I may quit the service, but it would be absurd to suspect me of desertion. The reputation of these papers is an honourable pledge for my attachment to the people. To sacrifice a respected character, and to renounce the effeem of fociety, requires more than Mr. Wedderburne's refolution; and though, in him, it was rather a profession than a defertion of his principles, [I speak tenderly of this gentleman, for when treachery is in question, I think we should make allowances for a Scotchman, I vet we have feen him in the house of commons overwhelmed with confusion, and almost bereft of his faculties .- But in truth, Sir, I have left no room for an accommodation with the piety of St. James's. My offences are not to be redeemed by recantation or repentance. On one fide, our warmest patriots would disclaim me as a burthen to their honest ambition. On the other, the vilett prostitution, if Junius could descend to it, would lose its natural merit and influence in the cabinet, and treachery be no longer a recommendation to royal favour.

THE persons, who, till within these few years, have been the most distinguished by their zeal for high church and prerogative, are now, it feems, the great affertors of the privileges of the house of com-This sudden alteration of their fentiments or language carries with it a suspicious appearance. When I hear the undefined privileges of the popular branch of the legislature exalted by Tories and Jacobites, at the expence of those strict rights, which are known to the jubject and limited by the Taws, I cannot but fuspect, that some mischievous scheme is in agitation, to destroy both law and privilege, by opposing them to each other. They who have uniformly denied the power of the whole legislature to alter the descent of the crown, and whose ancestors, in rebellion against his Majesty's family, have defended fended that doctrine at the hazard of their lives, now tell us that privilege of parliament is the only rule of right, and the chief fecurity of the public freedom .-I fear, Sir, that, while forms remain, there has been fome material change in the substance of our constitution. The oppinions of these men were too absurd to be eafily renounced. Liberal doctrines are capable of improvement.—There are profelites from atheism, but none from superstition .- If their prefent professions were fincere, I think they could not but be highly offended at feeing a question, concerning parliamentary privilege, unnecessarily started at a feafon fo unfavourable to the house of commons. and by so very mean and insignificant a person as the minor Onflow. They knew that the prefent house of commons, having commenced hostilities with the people, and degraded the authority of the laws by their own example, were likely enough to be refifted, per fas & nefas. If they were really friends to privilege, they would have thought the question of right too dangerous to be hazarded at this feafon, and, without the formality of a convention, would have left it undecided.

I HAVE been filent hitherto, though not from that shameful indifference about the interests of society which too many of us profess, and call moderation. I confess, Sir, that I felt the prejudices of my education, in favour of a house of commons, still hanging about me. I thought that a question, between law and privilege, could never be brought to a formal decision, without inconvenience to the public service, or a manifest diminution of legal liberty;—that it ought therefore to be carefully avoided: and when

when I saw that the violence of the house of commons had carried them too far to retreat, I determined not to deliver a hasty opinion upon a matter of so much delicacy and importance.

THE state of things is much altered in this country, fince it was necessary to protect our representarives against the direct the power of the crown. We have nothing to apprehend from prerogative, but every thing from undue influence. Formerly it was the interest of the heople, that the privileges of parliament should be left unlimited and undefined. At present it is not only their interest, but I hold it to be essentially necessary to the preservation of the constitution, that the privileges of parliament should be strictly ascertained, and confined within the narrowest bounds the nature of their institution will admit of. Upon the fame principle, on which I would have refisted prerogative in the last century, I now refult privilege. It is indifferent to me, whether the crown, by its own immediate act, impofes new, and dispenses with old laws, or whether the same arbitrary power produces the same effects through the medium of the house of commons. We trusted our representatives with privileges for their own defence and ours. We cannot hinder their defertion, but we can prevent their carrying over their arms to the fervice of the enemy.-It will be faid, that I begin with endeavouring to reduce the argument concerning privilege to a more question of convenience; that I deny at one moment what I would allow at another; and that to refift the power of a profituted house of commons may establish a precedent injurious to all future parliaments. - To this I answer generally, generally, that human affairs are in no instance governed by first positive right. If change of circumstances were to have no weight in directing our conduct and opinions, the mutual intercourte of mankind would be nothing more than a contention between positive and equitable right. Society would be a state of war, and law itself would be injustice. On this general ground, it is highly reasonable, that the degree of our submission to privileges, which have never been defined by any politive law, should be confidered as a question of convenience, and proportioned to the confidence we repose in the integrity of our representatives. As to the injury we may do to any future and more respectable house of commons, I own I am not now fanguine enough to expect a more plentiful harvest of parliamentary virtue in one year than in another. Our political climate is feverely altered; and, without dwelling upon the depravity of modern times, I think no reafonable man will expect that, as human nature is conflituted, the enormous influence of the crown should cease to prevail over the virtue of individuals. The mischief lies too deep to be cured by any remedy, less than some great convulsion, which may either carry back the constitution to its original principles, or utterly deflroy it. I do not doubt that, in the first session after the next election, some popular measures may be adopted. The present house of commons have injured themselves by too early and public profession of their principles; and if a strain of profficution, which had no example, were within the reach of emulation, it might be imprudent to hazard the experiment too foon. But after all, Sir, this very immeterial whether a house of commons shall preserve their virtue for a week, a month, or a year. The influence, which makes a septennial parliament dependant upon the pleasure of the crown, has a permanent operation, and cannot fail of success.—My premises, I know, will be denied in argument, but every man's conscience tells him they are true. It remains then to be considered, whether it be for the interest of the people that privilege of parliament (which *, in respect to the purposes, for which it has hitherto been acquiesced under, is merely nominal) should be contracted within some certain limits, or whether the subject shall be left at the mercy of a power, arbitrary upon the face of it, and notoriously under the direction of the crown.

I DO not mean to decline the question of right. On the contrary, Sir, I join issue with the advocates for privilege, and affirm, that, "excepting the cases, "wherein the house of commons are a court of justicature, [to which, from the nature of their office, a coercive power must belong] and excepting such contempts as immediately interrupt their proceedings, they have no legal authority to imprison any man for any supposed violation of privilege whatsoever."—It is not pretended that privilege, as now claimed, has ever been defined or confirmed by statute; neither can it be faid, with any colour of truth, to be a part of the common law of England, which had grown into prescription, long before we knew of the existence of a house of commons. As for the law of parliament it is only another name for the privilege in question; and fince the power of creating new privileges has been formally renounced by both houses, -fince there is no code, in which we can fludy the law of parliament, we have but one way left to make ourselves acquainted with it; -that is, to compare the nature of the inflitution of a house of commons, with the facts upon record. To establish a claim of privilege in either house, and to distinguish original right from usurpation, it must appear that it is indispensably necessary for the performance of the duty they are employed in, and also that it has been uniformly allowed. From the first part of this description it follows clearly, that whatever privilege does of right belong to the present house of commons, did equally belong to the first affembly of their predecessors, was as compleatly vefted in them, and might have been exercifed in the fame extent. From the second we must infer, that privileges, which for feveral centuries, were not only never allowed, but never even claimed by the house of commons, must be founded upon usurpation. The constitutional duties of a house of commons, are not very complicated nor mysterious. They are to propose or affent to wholesome laws for the benefit of the nation. They are to grant the necessary aids to the king; -- petition for the redress of grievances, and profecute high treafon or high crimes crimes against the state. If unlimited privilege be necessary to the performance of these duties, we have reason to conclude that, for many centuries after the institution of the house of commons, they were never performed. I am not bound to prove a negative, but I appeal to the English history when I affirm that, with the exceptions already stated, (which yet I might fafely relinquish) there is no precedent, from the year 1265 to the death of Queen Elizabeth, of the house of commons having imprifoned any man (not a member of their house) for contempt or breach of privilege. In the most flagrant cases, and when their acknowledged privileges were most grossly violated, the poor Commons, as they then stiled themselves, never took the power of punishment into their own hands. They either fought redress by petition to the King, or, what is more remarkable, applied for justice to the house of lords; and when fatisfaction was denied them or delayed, their only remedy was to refuse proceeding upon the King's business. So little conception had our ancestors of the monstrous doctrines, now maintained concerning privilege, that, in the reign of Elizabeth, even liberty of speech, the vital principle of a deliberative affembly, was restrained, by the Queen's authority, to a fimple age or no, and this restriction, though imposed upon three succesfive parliaments*, was never once disputed by the house of commons.

^{* &}quot;The necessity of fecuring the house of commons against the King's power, so that no interruption might be given either to the attendance of the members in parliament or the freedom of debate, was the soundation of parliamentary privilege; and we may observe, in all the addresses of new appointed Speakers to the Sovereign, the utmost privilege they demand is liberty of speech and seedom from arrests. The very word privilege, means no more than immunity, or a safeguard to the party who possesses it, and can never be construed into an active power of invading the rights of others."

I know there are many precedents of arbitrary commitments for contempt. But, besides that they are of too modern a date to warrant a presumption that fuch a power was originally vested in the house of commons, - Fael alone does not constitute Right. If it does, general warrants were lawful. - An ordinance of the two houses has a force equal to law: and the criminal jurifdiction assumed by the Commons in 1621, in the case of Edward Lloyd is a good precedent, to warrant the like proceedings against any man, who shall unadvisedly mention the folly of a King, or the ambition of a Princels .-The truth is, Sir, that the greatest and most exceptionable part of the privileges now contended for, were introduced and afferted by a house of commons which abolished both monarchy and peerage, and whose proceedings, although they ended in one glorious act of substantial justice, could no way be reconciled to the forms of the constitution. Their fuccessors profited by the example, and confirmed their power by a moderate or a popular use of it. Thus it grew by degrees, from a notorious innovation at one period, to be tacitly admitted as the privilege of parliament at another.

^{*} In the years 1593-1597-and 1601.

If however it could be proved, from confiderations of necessity or convenience, that an unlimited power of commitment ought to be intrusted to the house of commons, and that in fact they have exercised it without opposition, still, in contemplation of law, the presumption is strongly against them. It is a leading maxim of the laws of England (and, without it, all laws are nugatory) that there is no right without a remedy, nor any legal power without a legal course to carry it into effect. Let the power, now in question, be tried by this rule. The Speaker issues his warrant of attachment. The party attached either refifts force with force, or appeals to a magistrate, who declares the warrant illegal, and discharges the prisoner. Does the law provide no legal means for inforcing a legal warrant? Is there no regular proceeding pointed out in our law books to affert and vindicate the authority of fo high a court as the house of commons? The question is answered directly by the fact. Their unlawful commands are refifted, and they have no remedy. The imprisonment of their own members is revenge indeed, but it is no affertion of the privilege they contend for *: Their whole proceeding flops, and there they fland, ashamed to retreat, and unable to advance. Sir, these ignorant men should be informed that the execution of the laws of England is not left in this uncertain, defencelefs condition. If the process of the courts of Westminster-hall be refisted, they have a direct course, fufficient to inforce submission. The court of King's Bench commands the Sheriff to raise the poffe comitatus. The courts of Chancery and Exchequer iffue a writ of rebellion, which must also be supported, if necessary, by the power of the county.-To whom will our honest representatives direct their writ of rebellion? The guards, I doubt not, are willing enough to be employed, but they know nothing of the doctrine of writs, and may think it necessary to wait for a letter from Lord Barrington.

^{*} Upon their own principles, they should have committed Mr. Witkes, who had been guilty of a greater offence than even the Lord-Mayor or Alderman Oliver. But after repeatedly ordering him to attend, they at last adjourned beyond the day appointed for his attendance, and by this mean, pitiful evasion, gave up the point.—Such is the force of confcious guilt!

Ir may now be objected to me, that my arguments prove too much; for that certainly there may be instances of contempt and infult to the house of commons, which do not fall within my own exceptions, yet, in regard to the dignity of the house. ought not to pass unpunished. Be it so .- The courts of criminal jurisdiction are open to profecutions, which the Attorney General may commence by information or indicament. A libel, tending to afperfe or vilify the house of commons, or any of their members, may be as feverely punished in the court of King's Bench, as a libel upon the King. Mr. De Grey thought fo, when he drew up the information upon my letter to his Majesty, or he had no meaning in charging it to be a scandalous libel upon the house of commons. In my opinion. they would confult their real dignity much better. by appealing to the laws when they are offended. than by violating the first principle of natural jusfice, which forbids us to be judges, when we are parties to the cause *.

I no not mean to purfue them through the remainder of their proceedings. In their first resolutions, it is possible they might have been deceived by ill-considered precedents. For the rest, there is no colour of palliation or excuse. They have advised the King to resume a power of dispensing with the laws by royal proclamation*; and Kings we see are ready enough to follow such advice.—By mere violence, and without the shadow of right, they have expunged the record of a judicial proceeding †. Nothing remained, but to attribute to their own vote a power of stopping the whole distribution of criminal and civil justice.

[&]quot;If it be demanded, in case a subject should be committed by either house, for a matter manifestly out of their jurisdiction, what remedy can be have? I answer, that it cannot well be imagined that the law, which savours nothing more than the liberty of the society, should give as a remedy against commitments by the King himself, appearing to be illegal, and yet give us no manner of dress against a commitment by our fellow subjects, equally appearing to be unwarranted. But as this is a case, which I am persact ed will never happen, it seems needless over nicely to examine the markets. 2. 110 "——N. B. He was a good lawyer, but no profiles."

THE public virtues of the chief magistrate have long since ceased to be in question. But it is said that he has private good qualities, and I myself have been ready to acknowledge them. They are now brought to the test. If he loves his people, he will dissolve a parliament, which they can never conside in or respect.—If he has any regard for his own honour, he will dissain to be any longer connected with such abandoned prostitution. But if it were conceivable, that a King of this country had lost all sense of personal honour, and all concern for the welfare of his subjects, I confess, Sir, I should be contented to renounce the forms of the constitution once more, if there were no other way to obtain substantial justice for the people *.

^{*} That their practice might be every way conformable to their principles, the house proceeded to advise the crown to publish a proclamation universally acknowledged to be illegal. Mr. Moreton publicly protested against it before it was issued; and Lord Mansfield, though not scrupulous to an extreme, speaks of it with horror. It is remarkable enough that the very men, who advised the proclamation, and who hear it arraigned every day both within doors and without, are not daring enough to utter one word in its defence, nor have they ventured to take the least notice of Mr. Wilkes for discharging the persons apprehended under it.

⁺ Lord Chatham very properly called this the act of a mob, not of a fenate.

JUNIUS.

LETTER XLV.

TO THE PRINTER OF THE PUBLIC AD-VERTISER.

THEY, who object to detached parts of Junius's last letter, either do not mean him fairly, or have not considered the general scope and course of his argument.—There are degrees in all the private vices.—Why not in public prostitution?—The influence of the crown naturally makes a septennial

. When Mr. Wilkes was to be punished, they made no scruple about the privileges of parliament; and although it was as well known as any matter of public record and uninterrupted custom could be, that the members of either houses are privileged except in case of treason. felony, or breach of peace, they declared without hefitation that privilege of parliament did not extend to the case of a seditious libel; and undoubtedly they would have done the same if Mr. Wilkes had been profecuted for any other mifdemeanor whatfoever. The ministry are of a fudden grown wonderfully careful of privileges, which their predecessors were as ready to invade. The known laws of the land, the rights of the subject, the fanctity of charters, and the reverence due to our magistrates, must all give way, without question or resistance, to a privilege of which no man knows either the origin or the extent. The house of commons judge of their own privileges without appeal; -they may take offence at the most innocent action, and imprison the person who offends them, during their arbitrary will and pleasure. The party has no remedy; -he cannot appeal from their jurisdiction; and if he questions the privilege, which he is supposed to have violated, it becomes an aggravation of his offence. Surely this doctrine is not to be found in Magna Charta. If it be admitted without limitation, I affirm that there is neither law nor liberty in this kingdom. We are the flaves of the house of commons, and, through them, we are the flaves of the King and his ministers. Anonymous,

parlia-

parliament dependent. - Does it follow that every house of commons will plunge at once into the lowest depths of proflitution?-Junius supposes that the present house of commons, in going such enormous lengths, have been imprudent to themselves, as well as wicked to the public; -that their example is not within the reach of emulation ; - and that, in the first fession after the next election, some popular measures may probably be adopted. He does not expect that a diffolution of parliament will destroy corruption, but that at least it will be a check and terror to their successors, who will have seen that, in flagrant cases, their constituents, can and will interpose with effect. -After all, Sir, will you not endeavour to remove or alleviate the most dangerous symptoms, because you cannot eradicate the difease? Will you not punish treason or parricide, because the fight of a gibbet does not prevent highway robberies? When the main argument of Junius is admitted to be unanswerable, I think it would become the minor critic, who hunts for blemishes, to be a little more distrustful of his own fagacity.-The other objection is hardly worth an answer. When Junius observes that Kings are ready enough to follow fuch advice, he does not mean to infinuate that, if the advice of parliament were good, the king would be fo ready to follow it.

PHILO JUNIUS.

LETTER XLVI.

ADDRESSED TO THE PRINTER OF THE PUBLIC ADVERTISER.

SIR, 22 May, 1771.

TERY early in the debate upon the decision of the Middlesex election, it was well observed by Junius, that the house of commons had not only exceeded their boafted precedent of the expulsion and subsequent incapacitation of Mr. Walpole, but that they had not even adhered to it strictly as far as it went. After convicting Mr. Dyfon of giving a falle quotation from the journals, and having explained the purpose, which that contemptible fraud was intented to answer, he proceeds to state the vote itself. by which Mr. Walpole's supposed incapacity was declared,-viz. "Refolved, That Robert Walpole, " Esq; having been this session of parliament com-" mitted prisoner to the Tower, and expelled this " house for a high breach of trust in the execution of " his office, and notorious corruption when fecre-" tary at war, was and is incapable of being elected " a member to ferve in this present parliament."-And then observes that, from the terms of the vote, we have no right to annex the incapacitation to the expulsion only, for that, as the proposition stands, it must arise equally from the expulsion and the commitment to the Tower. I believe, Sir, no man, who knows any thing of dialectics, or who understands English, will dispute the truth and fairness of this construction. But Junius has a great authority to support him, which, to speak with the Duke of Grafton.

Grafton, I accidentally met with this morning in the course of my reading. It contains an admonition, which cannot be repeated too often. Lord Sommers, in his excellent tract upon the rights of the people, after reciting the votes of the convention, of the 28th of January, 1689, viz. - "That King " Tames the Second, having endeavoured to subvert " the constitution of this kingdom by breaking the " original contract between King and people ; and " by the advice of Jesuits and other wicked persons " having violated the fundamental laws, and having " withdrawn himself out of this kingdom, hath ab-" dicated the government, &c."-makes this obfervation upon it. "The word abdicated relates to " all the clautes aforegoing, as well as to his deferting the kingdom, or elfe they would have been "wholly in vain." And that there might be no pretence for confining the abdication merely to the withdrawing, Lord Sommers farther observes, That King Jemes, by refufing to govern us according to that law, by which he held the crown, did implicitly renounce his title to it.

Ir Junius's construction of the vote against Mr. Walpole be now admitted, (and indeed I cannot comprehend how it can honestly be disputed) the advocates of the house of commons must either give up their precedent entirely, or be reduced to the necessity of maintaining one of the grossest absurdities imaginable, viz. "That a commitment to the "Tower is a constituent part of, and contributes half at least to the incapacitation of the person who suffers it."

I NEED not make any excuse for endeavouring to keep

keep alive the attention of the public to the decision of the Middlefex election. The more I confider it. the more I am convinced that, as a faet, it is indeed highly injurious to the rights of the people; but that, as a precedent, it is one of the most dangerous that ever was established against those who are to come after us. Yet I am so far a moderate man, that I verily believe the majority of the house of commons. when they passed this dangerous vote, neither underflood the question, nor knew the consequence of what they were doing. Their motives were rather despicable than criminal in the extreme, One effect they certainly did not foresee. They are now reduced to fuch a fituation, that if a member of the prefent house of commons, were to conduct himself ever so improperly, and in reality deserved to be sent back to his constituents with a mark of disgrace, they would not dare to expel him; because they know that the people, in order to try again the great queftion of right, or to thwart an odious house of commons, would probably overlook his immediate unworthiness, and return the same person to parliament. -But in time, the precedent will gain strength. A future house of commons will have no such apprehenfions, confequently will not feruple to follow a precedent, which they did not establish. The mifer himself seldom lives to enjoy the fruit of his extortion; but his heir succeeds him of course, and takes possession without centure. No man expects him to make restitution, and no matter for his title, he lives quietly upon the effate.

PHILO JUNIUS.

LETTER XLVII.

TO THE PRINTER OF THE PUBLIC AD-VERTISER.

SIR. 25 May, 1771. I CONFESS my partiality to Junius, and feel a L confiderable pleasure in being able to communicate any thing to the public in support of his opinions. The doctrine laid down in his last letter concerning the power of the house of commons to commit for contempt, is not fo new as it appeared to many people, who, dazzled with the name of privilege, had never suffered themselves to examine the question fairly. In the course of my reading this morning, I met with the following passage in the journals of the house of commons. (Vol. 1st. page 603.) Upon occasion of a jurisdiction unlawfully assumed by the house in the year 1621, Mr. Attorney-General Noye gave his opinion as follows. " No doubt but, in some " cases, this house may give judgment; -in matters " of returns, and concerning members of our house, " or falling out in our view in parliament; but, for " foreign matters, knoweth not how we can judge " it .- Knoweth not that we have been used to give "judgment in any cafe, but those before-menti-" oned."

Sir Edward Coke, upon the same subject, says, (page 604) "No question but this is a house of re"cord, and that it hath power of judicature in some cases;—have power to judge of returns and members of our house; one, no member, offending

" ing out of the parliament, when he came hither and

" justified it, was censured for it."

Now, Sir, if you will compare the opinion of these great sages of the law with Junius's doctrine, you will find they tally exactly.—He allows the power of the house to commit their own members, (which however they may grossly abuse.) He allows their power in cases where they are acting as a court of judicature, viz. elections, returns, &c.—and he allows it in such contempts as immediately interrupt their proceedings, or, as Mr. Noye expresses it, falling out in their view in parliament.

THEY, who would carry the privileges of parliament farther than Junius, either do not mean well to the public, or know not what they are doing. The government of England is a government of law. We betray ourselves, we contradict the spirit of our laws, and we shake the whole system of English jurisprudence, whenever we intrust a discretionary power over the life, liberty, or fortune of the subject, to any man, or set of men whatsoever, upon a presumption that it will not be abused.

PHILO JUNIUS.

LETTER XLVIII.

TO THE PRINTER OF THE PUBLIC AD-VERTISER.

SIR, 28 May, 1771.

ANY man, who takes the trouble of peruling the journals of the house of commons, will from be convinced, that very little, if any regard at all, ought to be paid to the resolutions of one branch of the legislature, declaratory of the law of the land, or even of what they call the law of parliament. It will appear that these resolutions have no one of the properties, by which, in this country, particularly, law is diffinguished from mere will and pleasure; but that, on the contrary, they bear every mark of a power arbitrarily assumed and capriciously applied :- That they are usually made in times of contest, and to serve some unworthy purpose of passion or party; -that the law is seldom declared until after the fact, by which it is suppofed to be violated; - that legislation and jurisdiction are united in the same persons, and exercised at the fame moment; - and that a court, from which there is no appeal, assumes an original jurisdiction in a criminal case; -in short, Sir, to collect a thousand absurdities into one mass, "we have a law, which " cannot be known because it is ex post facto, the " party is both legislator and judge, and the jurif-"diction is without appeal." Well might the judges fay, The law of parliament is above us.

You will not wonder, Sir, that, with these quatifications, the declaratory resolutions of the house of commons should appear to be in perpetual contradiction, not only to common sense and to the laws we are acquainted with, (and which alone we can obey) but even to one another. I was led to trouble you with these observations by a passage, which, to speak in lutestring, I met with this morning in the course of my reading, and upon which I mean to put a question to the advocates for privilege.—On the 8th of March 1704, (vide Journals, Vol. 14. p. 565.) the house thought proper to come to the following resolutions.—1. "That no com"moner of England, committed by the house of "commons for breach of privilege or contempt of that house, ought to be, by any writ of Habeas "Corpus, made to appear in any other place, or before any other judicature, during that session of parliament, wherein such person was so com"mitted."

2. "THAT the Serjeant at Arms, attending this house do make no return of or yield any obedimence to the said writs of Habeas Corpus, and for such his refusal, that he have the protection of the house of commens".

Welbore Ellis, What say you? Is this the law of parliament or is it not? I am a plain man, Sir, and cannot follow you through the phlegmatic forms of an oration. Speak out, Grildrig,—say yes, or no.—If you say yes, I shall then inquire by what authority Mr. De Grey, the honest Lord Mansfield, and the Barons of the Exchequer, dared to grant a writ of Habeas Corpus for bringing the bodies of the Lord Mayor and Mr. Oliver before them, and why the Lieutenant of the Tower made any return to a writ, which the house of commons had, in a similar inflance,

^{*} If there be in reality any fuch law in England, as the law of parliament, which, (under the exceptions flated in my letter of privilege) I confess, after long deliberation, I very much doubt, it certainly is not constituted by, nor can it be collected from the resolutions of either house, whether enacting or declaratory. I defire the readen will compare the above resolution of the year 1704, with the following of the 3d of April, 1628—" Refolved, That the writ of "Habeas Corpus cannot be denied, but ought to be granted to every man, that is committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrains ed, by the command of the King, the Privy Council, or any other, "he praying the same."

instance, declared to be unlawful. - If you fay no, take care you do not at once give up the cause, in support of which you have so long and so laborioufly tortured your understanding. Take care you do not confess that there is no test by which we can diftinguish, -no evidence by which we can determine what is, and what is not the law of parliament. The resolutions I have quoted stand upon your journals, uncontroverted and unrepealed :they contain a declaration of the law of parliament by a court, competent to the question, and whose decision, as you and Lord Mansfield say, must be law, because there is no appeal from it, and they were made, not hastily, but after long deliberation upon a constitutional question .- What farther fanction or folemnity will you annex to any refolution of the present house of commons, beyond what appears upon the face of those two resolutions, the legality of which you now deny? If you fay that parliaments are not infallible, and that Queen Anne, in confequence of the violent proceedings of that house of commons, was obliged to prorogue and dissolve them, I shall agree with you very heartily, and think that the precedent ought to be followed immediately. But you, Mr. Ellis, who hold this language, are inconfistent with your own principles. You have hitherto maintained that the house of commons are the fole judges of their own privileges, and that their declaration does, ipfo facto, constitute the law of parliament; yet now you confeis that parliaments are fallible, and that their refolutions may be illegal, consequently that their resolutions do not constitute the law of parliament. When the

the King was urged to dissolve the present parliament, you advised him to tell his subjects, that he was careful not to assume any of those powers, which the constitution had placed in other hands, &c. Yet Queen Anne, it seems, was justified in exerting her prerogative to stop a house of commons, whose proceedings, compared with those of the assembly, of which you are a most worthy member, were the perfection of justice and reason.

In what a labyrinth of nonsense does a man involve himself who labours to maintain salsehood by argument? How much better would it become the dignity of the house of commons to speak plainly to the people, and tell us at once, that their will must be obeyed, not because it is lawful and reasonable, but because it is their will. Their constituents would have a better opinion of their candour, and, I promise you, not a worse opinion of their integrity.

PHILO JUNIUS,

LETTER XLIX.

TO HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF CRAFTON.

THE profound respect I bear to the gracious Prince, who governs this country with no less honour to himself than satisfaction to his subjects, and who restores you to your rank under his standard, will save you from a multitude of reproaches. The attention I should have paid to your failings is involuntarily attracted to the hand that rewards them; and though I am not so partial to the royal royal judgment, as to affirm, that the favour of a King can remove mountains of infamy, it serves to leffen at least, for undoubtedly it divides the burthen. While I remember how much is due to his facred character, I cannot, with any decent appearance of propriety, call you the meanest and the basest fellow in the kingdom. I protest, my Lo'd. I do not think you fo. You will have a dangerous rival, in that kind of fame to which you have hitherto so happily directed your ambition, as long as there is one man living, who thinks you worthy of his confidence, and fit to be trufted with any share in his government. I confess you have great intrinsic merit; but take care you do not value it too highly. Confider how much of it would have been loft to the world, if the King had not graciously affixed his stamp, and given it currency among his subjects. If it be true that a virtuous man, struggling with adversity, be a scene worthy of the gods, the glorious contention, between you and the best of Princes, deserves a circle, equally attentive and respectable. I think I already see other gods rifing from the earth to behold it.

But this language is too mild for the occasion. The King is determined, that our abilities shall not be lost to society. The perpetration and description of new crimes will find employment for us both. My Lord, if the persons, who have been loudest in their professions of patriotism, had done their duty to the public with the same zeal and perseverance that I did, I will not affert that government would have recovered its dignity, but at least our gracious Sovereign must have spared his subjects

iects this last infult *, which, if there be any feeling left among us, they will refent more than even the real injuries they received from every measure of your Grace's administration. In vain would be have looked round him for another character fo confummate as yours. Lord Mansfield fhrinks from his principles;—his ideas of government perhaps go farther than your own, but his heart difgraces the theory of his understanding .- Charles Fox is yet in bloffom; and as for Mr. Wedderburne. there is fomething about him, which even treachery cannot truft. For the present therefore, the best of Princes must have contented himself with Lord Sandwich.-You would long fince have received your final dismission and reward; and I, my Lord, who do not esteem you the more for the high office you possess, would willingly have followed you to your retirement. There is furely fomething fingularly benevolent in the character of our Sovereign. From the moment he ascended the throne, there is no crime, of which human nature is capable, (and I call upon the Recorder to witness it) that has not appeared venial in his fight. With any other Prince, the shameful desertion of him, in the midst of that diffress, which you alone had created,-in the very crisis of danger, when he fancied he faw the throne already furrounded by men of virtue and abilities, would have out-weighed the memory of your former services. But his Majesty is full of justice, and understands the doctrine of compensations. He remembers with gratitude how foon you had accommodated your morals to the necessity of his service;—how chearfully you had abandoned the engagements of private friendship, and renounced the most solemn professions to the public. The facrifice of Lord Chatham was not lost upon him. Even the cowardice and persidy of deserving him may have done you no differvice in his esteem. The instance was painful, but the principle might pleafe.

[&]quot; The Duke was lately appointed Lord Privy Seal.

You did not neglect the magistrate, while you flattered the man. The expulsion of Mr. Wilkes predetermined in the cabinet; -the power of depriving the subject of his birthright, attributed to a refolution of one branch of the legislature ;-the conflitution impudently invaded by the house of commons; -the right of defending it treacherously renounced by the house of lords.—These are the strokes, my Lord, which, in the present reign, recommend to office, and constitute a minister. They would have determined your Sovereign's judgment, if they had made no impression upon his heart. We need not look for any other species of merit to account for his taking the earliest opportunity to recall you to his councils. Yet you have other merit in abundance .- Mr. Hine, -the Duke of Portland, -and Mr. Yorke. - Breach of trust, robbery, and murder. You would think it a compliment to your gallantry, if I added rape to the catalogue; -but the stile of your amours secures you from refiftance. I know how well these several charges have been defended. In the first instance, the breach of trust is supposed to have been its own reward. Mr. Bradshaw affirms upon his honour, (and to may the gift of fmiling never depart from him!) that you referved no part of Mr. Hine's purchasemoney for your own use, but that every shilling of it was scrupulously paid to governor Burgoyne.— Make haste, my Lord,—another patent, applied in time, may keep the Oaks * in the samily.—If not, Birnham Wood, I fear, must come to the Macaroni.

THE Duke of Portland was your earliest friend. In defence of his property he had nothing to plead, but equity against Sir James Lowther, and prescription against the crown. You felt for your friend; but the law must take its course. Posterity will scarce believe that Lord Bute's son-in-law had barely interest enough at the treasury to get his grant compleated before the general election +.

ENOUGH has been faid of that detestable transfaction, which ended in the death of Mr. Yorke, —I cannot speak of it without horror and compassion. To excuse your self, you publicly impeach your accomplice, and to his mind perhaps the accusation may be flattery. But in murder you are both principals. It was once a question of emulation, and if the event had not disappointed the immediate schemes of the closet, it might still have been a hopeful subject of jest and merriment between you.

This letter, my Lord, is only a preface to my future correspondence. The remainder of the suminer shall be dedicated to your amusement. I mean

[•] A superb villa of Col. Burgoyne, about this time advertised for fale.

[†] It will appear by a subsequent letter, that the Duke's precipitazion, proved fatal to the grant. • It looks like the herry and consumo of a young highwayman, who takes a few shillings, but leaves the yurse and watch behind him.—And yet the Duke was an old offend.

now and then to relieve the severity of your morning studies, and to prepare you for the business of the day. Without pretending to more than Mr. Brad-shaw's fincerity, you may rely upon my attachment, as long as you are in office.

WILL your Grace forgive me, if I venture to express my anxiety for a man, whom I know you do not love? My Lord Weymouth has cowardice to plead, and a desertion of a later date than your own. You know the privy seal was intended for him; and if you consider the dignity of the post he deserted, you will hardly think it decent to quarter him on Mr. Rigby. Yet he must have bread, my Lord; —or rather he must have wine. If you deny him the cup, there will be no keeping him within the pale of the missistry.

JUNIUS.

LETTER L.

TO HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF GRAFTON.

MY LORD,

9 July, 1771.

THE influence of your Grace's fortune still feems to preside over the treasury.—The genius of Mr. Bradshaw inspires Mr. Robinson*. How remarkable it is, (and I speak of it not as matter of reproach, but as something peculiar to your character) that you have never yet formed a friendship, which has not been satal to the object of it, nor adopted a cause, to which, one way or other, you have not done mischief. Your attachment is infa-

* By an intercepted letter from the Secretary of the Treasury it appeared, that the friends of government were to be very active in supporting the ministerial nomination of sheriffs.

my while it lasts, and which ever way it turns, leaves ruin and disgrace behind it. The deluded girl, who yields to such a profligate, even while he is constant, forfeits her reputation as well as her innocence, and finds herself abandoned at last to misery and shame.

—Thus it happened with the best of Princes. Poor Dingley too !—I protest I hardly know which of them we ought to lament;—The unhappy man, who sinks under the weight of his dishonour, or him who survives it. Characters, so sinished, are placed beyond the reach of panegyric. Death has fixed his seal upon Dingley, and you, my Lord, have set your mark upon the other.

THE only letter I ever addressed to the King was fo unkindly received, that I believe I shall never prefume to trouble his Majesty, in that way, again. But my zeal for his fervice is superior to neglect, and like Mr. Wilkes's patriotifm, thrives by perfecution. Yet his Majesty is much addicted to useful reading, and, if I am not ill-informed, has honoured the Public Advertiser with particular attention. I have endeavoured therefore, and not without fuccefs, (as perhaps you may remember) to furnish it with fuch interesting and edifying intelligence, as probably would not reach him through any other channel. The fervices you have done the nation, -- your integrity in office, and fignal fidelity to your approved good master, have been faithfully recorded. Nor have his own virtues been entirely neglected. These letters, my Lord, are read in other countries and in other languages; and I think I may affirm without vanity, that the gracious character of the best of Princes is by this time not only perfectly known to his subjects, but tolerably well understood by the rest of Europe. In this respect alone, I have the advantage of Mr. Whitehead. His plan, I think, is too narrow. He seems to manufacture his verses for the sole use of the hero, who is supposed to be the subject of them, and, that his meaning may not be exported in foreign bottoms, sets all translation at defiance.

gentle-

Your Grace's re-appointment to a feat in the cabinet was announced to the publick by the ominous return of Lord Bute to this country. When that noxious planet approaches England, he never fails to bring plague and pestilence along with him. The king already feels the malignant effect of your influence over his councils. Your former administration made Mr. Wilkes an Alderman of London, and Representative of Middlesex. Your next appearance in office is marked with his election to the Shrievalty. In whatever measure you are concerned, you are not only disappointed of success, but always contrive to make the government of the best of Princes contemtible in his own eyes, and ridiculous to the whole world. Making all due allowance for the effect of the minister's declared interposition, Mr. Robinson's activity, and Mr. Horne's new zeal in support of administration, we still want the genius of the Duke of Grafton to account for committing the whole interest of government in the city, to the conduct of Mr. Harley. I will not bear hard upon your faithful triend and emissary Mr. Touchet, for I know the difficulties of his fituation, and that a few lottery tickets are of use to his economy. There is a proverb concerning persons in the predicament of this gentleman, which however cannot be firially applied to him. They commence dupes and finish knaves. Now Mr. Touchet's character is uniform. I am convinced that his fentiments never depended upon his circumstances, and that, in the most prosperous state of his fortune, he was always the very man he is at prefent.—But was there no other person of rank and confequence in the city, whom government could confide in, but a notorious Jacobite? Did you imagine that the whole body of the Dissenters, that the whole Whig-interest of London would attend at the levee, and fubmit to the directions of a notorious Jacobite? Was there no Whig magistrate in the city, to whom the fervants of George the Third could intrust the management of a business, so very interesting to their master as the election of sheriffs? Is there no room at St. James's, but for Scotchmen and Jacobites? My Lord, I do not mean to question the fincerity of Mr. Harley's attachment to his Majesty's government. Since the commencement of the present reign, I have seen still greater ccontradictions reconciled. The principles of these worthy Jacobites are not so absurd, as they have been represented. Their ideas of divine right are not fo much annexed to the person or family, as to the political character of the fovereign. Had there ever been an honest man among the Stuarts, his Majesty's present friends would have been Whigs upon principle. But the conversion of the best of Princes has removed their scruples. They have forgiven him the fins of his Hanoverian ancestors, and acknowledge the hand of Providence in the descent of the crown upon the head of a true Stuart. In you, my Lord, Lord, they also behold, with a kind of predilection, which borders upon loyalty, the natural representative of that illustrious family. The mode of your descent from Charles the Second is only a bar to your pretensions to the crown, and no way interrupts the regularity of your succession to all the virtues of the Stuarts.

14

THE unfortunate success of the reverend Mr. Horne's endeavours, in support of the ministerial nomination of theriffs, will I fear obstruct his preferment. Permit me to recommend him to your Grace's protection. You will find him copiously gifted with those qualities of the heart, which usually direct you in the choice of your friendships. He too was Mr. Wilkes's friend, and as incapable as you are of the liberal refentment of a gentleman. No, my Lord, -it was the folitary, vindictive malice of a monk, brooding over the infirmities of his friend, until he thought they quickened into public life; and feafling with a rancorous rapture, upon the fordid catalogue of his diffresses. Now, let him go back to his cloifter. The church is a proper retreat for him. In his principles he is already a Bishop.

THE mention of this man has moved me from my natural moderation. Let me return to your Grace. You are the pillow, upon which I am determined to rest all my resentments. What idea can the best of Sovereigns form to himself of his own government?—in what repute can he conceive that he stands with his people, when he sees, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that, whatever be the office, the suspicion of his savour is fatal to the candidate, and that, when the party he wishes well to has the fairest prospect of success, if his royal inclination should unfortunately be discovered, it drops like an acid, and turns the election. This event, among others, may perhaps contribute to open his Majesty's eyes to his real honour and interest. In spite of all your Grace's ingenuity, he may at last perceive the inconvenience of selecting, with such a curious felicity, every villain in the nation to fill the various departments of his government. Yet I should be forry to confine him in the choice either of his sootmen or his friends.

JUNIUS.

LETTER LI.

FROM THE REVEREND MR. HORNE TO JUNIUS.

SIR. 13 July, 1771. TARCE, Comedy, and Tragedy, -Wilkes, Footes and Junius, united at the same time, against one poor Parson, are fearful odds. The two former are only labouring in their vocation, and may equally plead in excuse, that their aim is a livelihood. I admit the plea for the fecond; his is an honest calling, and my clothes were lawful game; but I cannot fo readily approve Mr. Wilkes, or commend him for making patriotism a trade, and a fraudulent trade. But what shall I say to Junius? the grave, the folemn, the didactic! ridicule, indeed, has been ridiculously called the test of truth; but furely, to confess that you lose your natural moderation when mention is made of the man, does not promife promise much truth or justice when you speak of him yourfelf.

You charge me with " a new zeal in support of administration," and with " endeavours in " support of the ministerial nomination of She-" riffs." The reputation which your talents have deservedly gained to the fignature of Junius, draws from me a reply, which I disdained to give to the anonymous lies of Mr. Wilkes. You make frequent use of the word Gentleman; I only call myself a Man. and defire no other distinction: if you are either, you are bound to make good your charges, or to confess that you have done me a hasty injustice upon no authority.

I PUT the matter fairly to iffue .- I fay, that fo far from any " new zeal in support of administration," I am possessed with the utmost abhorrence of their measures; and that I have ever shewn myself, and am still ready, in any rational manner, to lay down all I have-my life, in opposition to those measures. I say, that I have not, and never have had any communication or connexion of any kind, directly or indirectly, with any courtier or ministerial man, or any of their adherents: that I never have received, or folicited, or expected, or defired, or do now hope for, any reward of any fort, from any party or let of men in administration or opposition: I say, that I never used any " endea-" yours in support of the ministerial nomination of "Sheriffs." That I did not folicit any one liveryman for his vote for any one of the candidates; nor employ any other person to solicit: and that I did not write one fingle line or word in favour of Mesfrs. Plumbe Plumbe and Kirkman, whom I understand to have been supported by the ministry.—

You are bound to refute what I here advance, or to lose your credit for veracity: You must produce facts; surmise and general abuse, in however elegant language, ought not to pass for proofs. You have every advantage, and I have every disadvantage: you are unknown, I give my name: all parties, both in and out of administration, have their reasons (which I shall relate hereafter) for uniting in their wishes against me: and the popular prejudice is as strongly in your favour, as it is violent against the Parson.

SINGULAR as my present situation is, it is neither painful, nor was it unforeseen. He is not fit for public business who does not even at his entrance prepare his mind for such an event. Health, fortune, tranquility, and private connexions I have factificed upon the altar of the public; and the only return I receive, because I will not concur to dupe and mislead a senseless multitude, is barely, that they have not yet torn me in pieces. That this has been the only return, is my pride; and a source of more real satisfaction than honours or prosperity. I can practise before I am old, the lessons I learned in my youth; nor shall I ever forget the words of my ancient Monitor,

"Tis the last key-stone

"That makes the arch: the rest that there were put,

" Are nothing till that comes to bind and shut.

" Then stands it a triumphal mark! then men

66 Observe the strength, the height, the why and "It was erected; and still walking under,

"Meet fome new matter to look up and wonder!"

I am, SIR,

Your humble Servant, JOHN HORNE.

LETTER LIL.

TO THE REVEREND MR. HORNE.

24 July, 1771. SIR. I CANNOT descend to an altercation with you In the news-papers. But fince I have attacked your character, and you complain of injustice, I think you have some right to an explanation. You defy me to prove, that you ever folicited a vote, or wrote a word in support of the ministerial aldermen. Sir, I did never suspect you of such gross folly. It would have been impossible for Mr. Horne to have folicited votes, and very difficult to have written for the news-papers in defence of that cause, without being detected and brought to shame. Neither do I pretend to any intelligence concerning you, or to know more of your conduct, than you yourfelf have thought proper to communicate to the public. It is from your own letters I conclude that you have fold yourself to the ministry: or, if that charge be too severe, and supposing it possible to be deceived by appearances so very strongly against you, what are your friends to say in your defence? must they not confess that, to gratify your personal hatred of Mr. Wilkes, you sacrificed, as far as depended upon your interest and abilities, the cause of the country? I can make allowance for the violence violence of the passions, and if ever I should be convinced that you had no motive but to destroy Wilkes, I shall then be ready to do justice to your character, and to declare to the world that I despife you fomewhat less than I do at present.-But as a public man, I must for ever condemn you. cannot but know, -- nay you dare not pretend to be ignorant, that the highest gratification of which the most detestable in this nation is capable, would have been the defeat of Wilkes. I know that man much better than any of you. Nature intended him only for a good-humoured fool. A fystematical education, with long practice, has made him a confummate hypocrite. Yet this man, to fay nothing of his worthy ministers, you have most affiduoufly laboured to gratify. To exclude Wilkes, it was not necessary you should solicit votes for his opponents. We incline the balance as effectually by leffening the weight in one scale, as by increasing it in the other.

The mode of your attack upon Wilkes (though I am far from thinking meanly of your abilities) convinces me, that you either want judgment extremely, or that you are blinded by your refentment. You ought to have foreseen, that the charges you urged against Wilkes could never do him any mischief. After all, when we expected discoveries highly interesting to the community, what a pitiful detail did it end in !—Some old cloaths—a Welsh poney—a French footman, and a hamper of clarer. Indeed, Mr. Horne, the public should, and will forgive him his claret and his footmen, and even the ambition of making his brother cham-chamberlain of London, as long as he stands forth against a ministry and parliament, who are doing every thing they can to enflave the country, and as long as he is a thorn in the King's fide. You will not fufpect me of fetting up Wilkes for a perfect character. The question to the public is, where shall we find a man, who, with purer principles, will go the lengths, and run the hazards that he has done? the feafon calls for fuch a man, and he ought to be fupported. What would have been the triumph of that odious hypocrite and his minions, if Wilkes had been defeated! It was not your fault, reverend Sir, that he did not enjoy it compleatly.—But now I promise you, you have so little power to do mischief, that I much question whether the ministry will adhere to the promifes they have made you. It will be in vain to fay that I am a partizan of Mr. Wilkes, or personally your enemy. You will convince no man, for you do not believe it yourfelf. Yet, I confess, I am a little offended at the low rate, at which you feem to value my understanding. I beg, Mr. Horne, you will hereafter believe that I measure the integrity of men, by their conduct, not by their professions. Such tales may entertain Mr. Oliver, or your grandmother, but trust me, they are thrown away upon Junius.

You say you are a man. Was it generous, was it manly, repeatedly to introduce into a news-paper, the name of a young lady, with whom you must heretofore have lived on terms of politeness and good-humour?—but I have done with you. In my opinion, your credit is irrecoverably ruined. Mr. Townshend, I think is nearly in the same predicament.—Poor Oliven has been shamefully duped by you. You have made him facrifice all the honour he got by his imprisonment.—As for Mr. Sawbridge, whose character I really respect, I am assonished he does not see through your duplicity. Never was so base a design so poorly conducted.—This letter, you see, is not intended for the public, but if you think it will do you any service, you are at liberty to publish it.

JUNIUS.

Horne, by Junius's request. Mr. Horne returned it to the Printer, with directions to publish it.

LETTER LIII.

FROM THE REVEREND MR. HORNE TO JUNIUS.

SIR. 31 Fuly. 1771. YOU have disappointed me. When I told you that furmife and general abuse, in however elegant language, ought not to pass for proofs, I evidently hinted at the reply which I expected : but you have dropped your usual elegance, and feem willing to try what will be the effect of furmise and general abuse in very coarse language. Your answer to my letter (which I hope was cool, temperate and modest) has convinced me that my idea of a man is much superior to yours of a gentleman. Of your former letters I have always faid materiem Superabat obus: I do not think fo of the present; the principles are more detestable than the expressions are mean and illiberal. I am contented that all those who adopt the one should for ever load me with the other.

I APPEAL to the common-sense of the public, to which

which I have ever directed myself: I believe they have it, though I am fometimes half-inclined to fufpect that Mr. Wilkes has formed a truer judgment of mankind than I have. However of this I am fure, that there is nothing elfe upon which to place a steady reliance. Trick, and low cunning, and addreffing their prejudices and passions, may be the fittest means to carry a particular point; but if they have not common-sense, there is no prospect of gaining for them any real permanent good. The tame passions which have been artfully used by an honest man for their advantage, may be more artfully employed by a dishonest man for their destruction. I defire them to apply their common fense to this letter of Junius, not for my fake, but their own; it concerns them most nearly, for the principles it contains lead to difgrace and ruin, and are inconfistent with every notion of civil society.

THE charges which Junius has brought against me are made ridiculous by his own inconsistency and self-contradiction. He charges me positively with "a new zeal in support of administration;" and with "endeavours in support of the ministerial no-"mination of Sheriss." And he assigns two inconsistent motives for my conduct: either that I have "fold myself to the ministry;" or am instigated by the solitary, vindictive "malice of a monk:" either that I am influenced by a forded desire of gain; or am hurried on by "personal hatred and "blinded by resentment." In his letter to the Duke of Graston he supposes me actuated by both: in his letter to me he at first doubts which of the two, whether interest, or revenge is my motive: however, at last he determines for the former, and again positively afferts that " the ministry have made me or promises;" yet he produces no instance of corruption, nor pretends to have any intelligence of a ministerial connexion: he mentions no cause of perfonal hatred to Mr. Wilkes, nor any reason for my refentment, or revenge; nor has Mr. Wilkes himfelf ever hinted any, though repeatedly preffed. When Junius is called upon to justify his accufation, he answers, " he cannot descend to an altercation with " me in the news papers." Junius, who exists only in the news papers, who acknowledges " he has attacked my character" there, and "thinks I have " some right to an explanation;" yet this Junius " cannot descend to an altercation in the news pa-" pers!" and because he cannot descend to an altercation with me in the news papers, he fends a letter of abuse by the printer, which he finishes with telling me-" I am at liberty to publiff it." This to be fure is a most excellent method to avoid an altercation in the news papers!

The proofs of his positive charges are as extraordinary, "He does not pretend to any intelligence" concerning me, or to know more of my conduct than I myself have thought proper to communicate to the public." He does not suspect me of such gross folly as to have solicited votes, or to have written anonymously in the news papers; because it is impossible to do either of these without being detected and brought to shame. Junius says this I Who yet imagines that he has himself written two years under that signature, (and more under others) without being detected!—his warmest admires will not hereafter add, without being brought to shame. But though he did never suspect me of such gross folly as to run the hazard of being detected and brought to shame by anonymous writing, he infifts that I have been guilty of a much groffer folly of incurring the certainty of shame and detection by writing figned with my name! But this is a small flight for the towering Junius: " He is FAR from " thinking meanly of my abilities," though he is " convinced that I want judgment extremely," and can, " really respect Mr. Sawbridge's character," though he declares him * to be fo poor a creature as not to " fee through the bafest design conducted " in the poorest manner !" And this most base design is conducted in the poorest manner, by a man whom he does not suspect of gross folly, and of whose abilities he is FAR from thinking meanly!

SHOULD we ask Junius to reconcile these contradictions, and explain this nonsense; the answer is ready; "he cannot descend to an altercation in the news papers." He seels no reluctance to at-

* I beg leave to introduce Mr. Horne to the character of the Double Dealer. I thought they had been better acquainted.—" Another very wrong objection has been made by fome, who have not taken leifure to diffinguish the characters. The hero of the play (meaning Mellefont) is a gull, and made a fool, and cheated.—Is every man a gull and a fool that is deceived?—At that rate, I am that the two classes of men will be reduced to one, and the knaves themselves be at a loss to justify their title. But if an open, honest-hearted man, who has an entire considence in one, whom he takes to be his friend, and who (to consirm him in his opinion) in all appearance and upon several trials has been so; if this man be deceived by the treachery of the other, must be of necessity commence fool immediately, only because the other has proved a villain?"—YES, says parson Horne. No, says Congreve, and he, I think, is allowed to have known something of human asture.

tack the character of any man: the throne is not too high, nor the cottage too low: his mighty malice can grasp both extremes: he hints not his accusations as opinion, conjecture, or inference; but delivers them as positive assertions: Do the accused complain of injustice? He acknowledges they have some fort of right to an explanation; but if they ask for proofs and sacis, he begs to be excused: and though he is no where else to be encountered—" he cannot descend to an altercation in the news papers."

AND this perhaps Junius may think "the liberal resentment of a Gentleman:" this skulking assassing as in this 1

hope we differ :

"I thought that fortitude had been a mean

"Twixt fear and rashness; not a lust obscene

" Or appetite of offending; but a skill

" And nice difcernment between good and ill.

" Her ends are honesty and public good,

" And without these she is not understood."

Or two things however he has condescended to give proof. He very properly produces a young lady to prove that I am not a man: and a good old anoman, my grandmother, to prove Mr. Oliver a fool. Poor old foul! the read her bible far otherwise than Junius! the often found there that the fins of the fathers had been visited on the children; and therefore was cautious that herself and her immediate descendents should leave no reproach on her posterity: and they left none: how little could she foresee this reverse of Junius, who visits my political sins upon my grandmother! I do not charge this to the

the score of malice in him, it proceeded intirely from his propensity to blunder; that whilst he was reproaching me for introducing in the most harmless manner, the name of one female, he might himself at the same instant, introduce two.

I AM represented alternately as it suits Junius's purpose, under the opposite characters of a gloomy Monk, and a man of politeness and good humour. I am called " a folitary Monk," in order to confirm the notion given of me in Mr. Wilkes's anonymous paragraphs, that I never laugh: and the terms of politeness and good humour on which I am faid to have lived heretofore with the young lady, are intended to confirm other paragraphs of Mr. Wilkes, in which he is supposed to have offended me by refusing his daughter. Ridiculous! Yet I cannot deny but that Junius has proved me unmanly and ungenerous as clearly as he has shewn me corrupt and vindiclive: and I will tell him more; I have paid the present Ministry as many visits, and compliments as ever I paid to the young lady, and shall all my life treat them with the same politeness and good humour.

But Junius "begs me to believe that he mea"fures the integrity of men by their conduct, not by their professions." Sure this Junius must imagine his readers as void of understanding, as he is of modesty! Where shall we find the standard of his integrity? By what are we to measure the conduct of this lurking assassing?—And he says this to me, whose conduct, wherever I could personally appear,
has been as direct and open and public as my words;
I have not, like him, concealed myself in my chamber to shoot my arrows out of the window; nor contented myfelf to view the battle from afar; but publicly mixed in the engagement, and shared the danger. To whom have I, like him, refused my name upon complaint of injury? what printer have I defired to conceal me? in the infinite variety of business I have been concerned, where it is not so easy to be faultless, which of my actions can he arraign? to what danger has any man been exposed, which I have not faced? information, action, impriforment, or death? what labour have I refused? what expence have I declined? what pleasure have I not renounced? -But Junius, to whom no conduct belongs " measures the integrity of men by their " conduct, not by their professions;" himself all the while being nothing but professions, and those too anonymous! the political ignorance or wilful falshood of this declaimer is extreme: his own former letters justify both my conduct and those whom his last letter abuses: for the public measures, which Junius has been all along defending, were ours, whom he attacks; and the uniform oppofer of those measures has been Mr. Wilkes, whose bad actions and intentions he endeavours to fcreen.

LET Junius now, if he pleases, change his abuse; and quitting his loose hold of interest and revenge, accuse me of vanity, and call this desence boasting. I own I have a pride to see statues decreed, and the highest honours conferred for measures and actions which all men have approved: whilst those who counselled and caused them are executed and insulted. The darkness in which Junius thinks himself shrouded, has not concealed him; nor the artistice of only attacking under that fignature those he would pull down (whilft he recommends by other ways those he would have promoted) disguised from me whose partizan he is. When Lord Chatham can forgive the aukward fituation in which for the fake of the public he was defignedly placed by the thanks to him from the city: and when Wilkes's name ceases to be necessary to Lord Rockingham to keep up a clamour against the perfons of the ministry, without obliging the different factions now in opposition to bind themselves beforehand to some certain points, and to stipulate some precise advantages to the public; then, and not till then, may those whom he now abuses expect the approbation of Junius. The approbation of the public for our faithful attention to their interest by endeavours for those stipulations, which have made us as obnoxious to the factions in opposition as to those in administration, is not perhaps to be expected till fome years hence; when the public will look back and fee how shamefully they have been deluded; and by what arts they were made to lofe the golden opportunity of preventing what they will turely experience, -a change of ministers, without a material change of measures, and without any fecurity for a tottering constitution.

fignature

But what cares Junius for the fecurity of the constitution? He has now unfolded to us his diabotical principles. As a public man he must ever condemn any measure which may tend accidentally to gratify the Sovereign: and Mr. Wilkes is to be supported and affished in all his attempts (no matter how ridiculous and mischievous his projects) as long as he continues to be a thorn in the King's side!—The cause of the country; it feems, in the opinion of Junius, is merely to vex the King; and any rascal is to be supported in any roguery, provided he can only thereby plant a thorn in the King's fide .- This is the very extremity of faction, and the last degree of political wickedness. Because Lord Chatham has been ill-treated by the King and treacherously betrayed by the Duke of Grafton, the latter is to be "the pillow on which Junius will rest his resent-"ment;" and the public are to oppose the meafures of government from mere motives of personal enmity to the Sovereign !- These are the avowed principles of the man who in the same letter fays. " if ever he should be convinced that I had no mo-"tive but to destroy Wilkes, he shall then be ready "to do justice to my character, and to declare to " the world that he despises me somewhat less than " he does at present!" Had I ever acted from perfonal affection or enmity to Mr. Wilkes, I should justly be despised: But what does he deserve whose avowed motive is perfonal enmity to the Sovereign; the contempt which I should otherwise feel for the absurdity and glaring inconsistency of Junius, is here swallowed up in my abhorrence of his principle. The right divine and facredness of Kings is to me a fenseless jargon. It was thought a daring expression of Oliver Cromwell in the time of Charles. the First, that if he found himself placed opposite to the King in battle, he would discharge his piece into his bosom as soon as into any other man's. I go farther: had I lived in those days, I would not have waited for chance to give me an opportunity of doing my duty; I would have fought him through the ranks, and without the least personal enmity, have discharged my piece into his bosom rather than into any other man's. The King, whose actions justify rebellion to his government, deserves death from the hand of every subject. And should such a time arrive, I shall be as free to act as to say. But till then, my attachment to the person and family of the Sovereign shall ever be found more zealous and sincere than that of his flatterers. I would offend the Sovereign with as much reluctance as the parent; but if the happiness and security of the whole samily made it necessary, so far and no farther, I would offend him without remorse.

But let us consider a little whither these principles of funius would lead us. Should Mr. Wilkes once more commission Mr. Thomas Walpole to procure for him a pension of one thousand pounds upon the Irish establishment for thirty years; he must be supported in the demand by the public—because it would mortify the King!

SHOULD he wish to see Lord Rockingham and his friends once more in administration, unclogged by any stipulations for the people, that he might again enjoy a pension of one thousand and forty pounds a year, viz. From the First Lord of the Treasury 500 l. From the Lords of the Treasury 60 l. each. From the Lords of Trade 40 l. each, &c. The public must give up their attention to points of national benefit, and assist Mr. Wilkes in his attempt—because it would mortify the King!

SHOULD he demand the Government of Canada, or of Jamaica, or the embassy to Constantinople; and in case of resusal threaten to write them down, as he had before ferved another administration, in a year and a half; he must be supported in his pretensions and upheld in his insolence—because it would mortify the King!

JUNIUS may chuse to suppose that these things cannot happen! But that they have happened, notwithstanding Mr. Wilkes's denial, I do aver. I maintain that Mr. Wilkes did commission Mr. Thomas Walpole to folicit for him a pension of one thousand pounds on the Irish establishment for thirty years; with which and a pardon he declared he would be fatisfied: and that, notwithstanding his letter to Mr. Onflow, he did accept a clandestine, precarious and eleemofinary pension from the Rockingham administration; which they paid in proportion to and out of their falaries; and fo entirely was it ministerial, that as any of them went out of the ministry, their names were scratched out of the lift, and they contributed no longer. I fay, he did folicit the governments and the embaffy, and threatened their refusal nearly in these words-" It cost " me a year and a half to write down the last ad-46 ministration, should I employ as much time upon 45 you, very few of you would be in at the death." When these threats did not prevail, he came over to England to embarrass them by his presence; and when he found that Lord Rockingham was fomething firmer and more manly than he expected, and refused to be bullied-into what he could not perform, Mr. Wilkes declared that he could not leave England without money; and the Duke of Portland and Lord Rockingham purchased his abtence with one hundred pounds a piece; with which he returned to Paris. And for the truth of what I here advance, I appeal to the Duke of Portland, to Lord Rockingham, to Lord John Cavendish, to Mr. Walpole, &c.—I appeal to the hand-writing of Mr. Wilkes, which is still extant.

SHOULD Mr. Wilkes afterwards (failing in his wholefale trade) chuse to dole out his popularity by the pound, and expose the city offices to sale to his brother, his attorney, &c. Junius will tell us, it is only an ambition that he has to make them chamberlain, town-clerk, &c. and he must not be opposed in thus robbing the antient citizens of their birth-right—because any defeat of Mr. Wilkes would gratify the King!

SHOULD he, after confuming the whole of his own fortune and that of his wife, and incurring a debt of twenty thousand pounds merely by his own private extravagance, without a fingle fervice or exertion all this time for the public, whilst his eftate remained; should he, at length, being undone, commence patriot, have the good fortune to be illegally persecuted, and in confideration of that illegality be espoused by a few gentlemen of the purest public principles; fhould his debts, (though none of them were contracted for the public) and all his other incumbrances be discharged; should he be offered 600 l. or 1000 l. a year to make him independent for the future; and should he, after all, instead of gratitude for these services, insolently forbid his benefactors to bestow their own money upon any other object but himself, and revile them for setting any bounds to their supplies; Junius (who, any more than Lord Chatham, never contributed one farthing farthing to these enormous expences) will tell them, that if they think of converting the supplies of Mr. Wilkes's private extravagance to the support of public measures——they are as great fools as my grandmother; and that Mr. Wilkes ought to hold the strings of their purses—as long as he continues to be a thorn in the King's fide!

UPON these principles I never have acted, and I never will act. In my opinion, it is less dishonourable to be the creature of a court than the tool of a faction. I will not be either. I understand the two great leaders of opposition to be Lord Rockingham and Lord Chatham; under one of whose banners all the opposing members of both houses, who defire to get places, enlist. I can place no confidence in either of them, or in any others, unless they will now engage, whilst they are out, to grant certain effential advantages for the fecurity of the public when they shall be IN administration. These points they refuse to stipulate, because they are fearful lest they should prevent any future overtures from the court. To force them to these flipulations has been the uniform endeavour of Mr. Sawbridge, Mr. Townsend, Mr. Oliver, &c. and THEREFORE, they are abused by Junius. I know no reason but my zeal and industry in the same cause that should intitle me to the honour of being ranked by his abuse with persons of their fortune and station. It is a duty which I owe to the memory of the late Mr. Beckford to fay, that he had no other aim than this when he provided that sumptuous entertainment at the Mansion-house for the members of both houses in opposition. At that time time he drew up the heads of an engagement, which he gave to me with a request that I would couch it in terms fo cautious and precife, as to leave no room for future quibble, and evafion; but to oblige them either to fulfil the intent of the obligation, or to fign their own infamy, and leave it on record; and this engagement he was determined to propose to them at the Mansion-house, that either by their refusal they might forfeit the confidence of the public, or by the engagement lay a foundation for confidence. When they were informed of the intention, Lord Rockingham and his friends flatly refused any engagement; and Mr. Beckford as flatly fwore, they should then-" eat none of his broth;" and he was determined to put off the entertainment: But Mr. Beckford was prevailed upon by ---- to indulge them in the ridiculous parade of a popular procession through the city, and to give them the foolish pleasure of an imaginary consequence, for the real benefit only of the cooks and purveyors.

It was the same motive which dictated the shanks of the city to Lord Chatham; which were expressed to be given for his declaration in savour of short parliaments: in order thereby to fix Lord Chatham at least to that one constitutional remedy, without which all others can afford no security. The embarrassment no doubt was cruel. He had his choice either to offend the Rockingham party, who declared formally against short parliaments, and with the assistance of whose numbers in both houses he must expect again to be minister; or to give up the considence of the public, from whom finally all real consequence must proceed. Lord Chatham chose chose the latter: and I will venture to say, that, by his answer to those thanks, he has given up the people without gaining the friendship or cordial assistance of the Rockingham faction; whose little politics are confined to the making of matches, and extending their family connexions, and who think they gain more by procuring one additional vote to their party in the house of commons, than by adding their languid property and feeble character to the abilities of a Chatham, or the confidence of a public.

WHATEVER may be the event of the prefent wretched state of politics in this country, the principles of Junius will fuit no form of government. They are not to be tolerated under any constitution. Personal enmity is a motive fit only for the devil. Whoever or whatever is Sovereign demands the respect and support of the people. The union is formed for their happiness, which cannot be had without mutual respect; and he counsels maliciously who would perfuade either to a wanton breach of it. When it is banished by either party, and when every method has been tried in vain to restore it, there is no remedy but a divorce: But even then he must have a hard and a wicked heart indeed who punishes the greatest criminal merely for the fake of the punishment; and who does not let fall a tear for every drop of blood that is shed in a public struggle, however just the quarrel.

JOHN HORNE

LETTER LIV.

TO THE PRINTER OF THE PUBLIC AD-

15 August, 1771. SIR. T OUGHT to make an apology to the Duke of Grafton, for fuffering any part of my attention to be diverted from his Grace to Mr. Horne. I am not justified by the similarity of their dispositions. Private vices, however deteltable, have not dignity fufficient to attract the centure of the prefs, unlefs they are united with the power of doing some fignal mischief to the community .- Mr. Horne's situation does not correspond with his intentions.-In my own opinion, (which I know, will be attributed to my usual vanity and presumption) his letter to me does not deserve an answer. But I understand that the publick are not fatisfied with my filence; -that an answer is expected from me, and that if I perfift in refusing to plead, it will be taken for conviction. I should be inconsistent with the principles I profess, if I declined an appeal to the good fense of the people, or did not willingly submit myfelf to the judgment of my peers.

If any coarse expressions have escaped me, I am ready to agree that they are unfit for Junius to make use of, but I see no reason to admit that they have been improperly applied.

MR. HORNE, it seems, is unable to comprehend how an extreme want of conduct and indiscretion can consist with the abilities I have allowed him; nor can be conceive that a very honest man, with a very good understanding, may be deceived by a knave. His knowledge of human nature must be Had he never mixed with the limited indeed. world, one would think that even his books might have taught him better. Did he hear Lord Manifield, when he defended his doctrine concerning libels?—Or when he stated the law in profecutions for criminal conversation?-Or when he delivered his reasons for calling the house of lords together to receive a copy of his charge to the jury in Woodfall's trial?-Had he been prefent upon any of these occasions, he would have seen how possible it is for a man of the first talents, to confound himself in abfurdities, which would difgrace the lips of an ideot. Perhaps the example might have taught him not to value his own understanding so highly.-Lord Littleton's integrity and judgment are unqueftionable; -yet he is known to admire that cunning Scotchman, and verily believes him an honest man -I fpeak to facts, with which all of us are converfant,-I speak to men and to their experience. and will not descend to answer the little sneering sophistries of a collegian. Distinguished talents are not necessarily connected with discretion. If there be any thing remarkable in the character of Mr. Horne, it is that extreme want of judgment should be united with his very moderate capacity. Yet I have not forgotten the acknowledgment I made him. He owes it to my bounty; and though his letter has lowered him in my opinion, I feorn to retra& the charitable donation.

I said it would be very difficult for Mr. horne to write directly in defence of a ministerial mea fure, and not be detected; and even that difficulty I confined to his particular fituation. He changes the terms of the proposition, and supposes me to affert, that it would be impossible for any man to write for the news-papers and not be discovered.

HE repeatedly affirms, or intimates at least, that he knows the author of these letters. - With what colour of truth then can be pretend that I am no where to be encountered but in a news-paper? - I shall leave him to his fuspicions. It is not necessary that I should confide in the honour or discretion of a man, who already feems to hate me with as much rancour, as if I had formerly been his friend.—But he afferts that he has traced me thro' a variety of fignatures. To make the discovery of any importance to his purpose, he should have proved, either that the fictitious character of Junius has not been confistently supported, or that the author has maintained different principles under different fignatures. -I cannot recall to my memory the numberless trifles I have written; -but I rely upon the confcioutness of my own integrity, and defy him to fix any colourable charge of inconfistency upon me.

I AM not bound to assign the secret motives of his apparent hatred of Mr. Wilkes: nor does it follow that I may not judge fairly of his conduct, though it were true that I had no conduct of my own.

—Mr. Horne enlarges, with rapture, upon the importance of his services;—the dreadful battles which he might have been engaged in, and the dangers he has escaped.—In support of the formidable description, he quotes verses without mercy. The gentleman deals in fiction, and naturally appeals to the evidence of the poets.—Taking him at his word, he cannot but admit the superiority of Mr. Wilkes in this line of his service. On one side we see nothing but imaginary distresses. On the other we see real prosecutions;—real penalties;—real imprisonment;—life repeatedly hazarded; and, at one moment, almost the certainty of death. Thanks are undoubtedly due to every man who does his duty in the engagement; but it is the wounded soldier who deserves the reward.

I DID not mean to deny that Mr. Horne had been an active partizan. It would defeat my own purpose not to allow him a degree of merit, which aggravates his guilt. The very charge of contributing his utmost efforts to support a ministerial measure, implies an acknowledgment of his former fervices. If he had not once been diftinguished by his apparent zeal in defence of the common cause, he could not now be distinguished by deferting it. - As for myself, it is no longer a question whether I shall mix with the throng, and take a fingle share in the danger. Whenever Junius appears, he must encounter a host of enemies. But is there no honourable way to ferve the public, without engaging in personal quarrels with infignificant individuals, or fubmitting to the drudgery of canvasting votes for an election? Is there no merit in dedicating my life to the information of my fellow subjects?-What public question have I declined, what villain have I spared?—Is there no labour in the composition of these letters? Mr. Horne, I fear, is partial to mo, and measures the facility of my writings, by the fluency of his own. H

HE talks to us, in high terms, of the gallant feats he would have performed, if he had lived in the last century. The unhappy Charles could hardly have escaped him. But living princes have a claim to his attachment and respect. Upon these terms, there is no danger in being a patriot. If he means any thing more than a pompous rhapfody, let us try, how well his argument holds together. - I prefume he is not yet fo much a courtier as to affirm that the constitution has not been grossly and daringly violated under the present reign. He will not say, that the laws have not been shamefully broken or perverted:-that the rights of the subject have not been invaded, or that redress has not been repeatedly folicited and refused. - Grievances like these were the foundation of the rebellion in the last century, and, if I understand Mr. Horne, they would, at that period, have justified him to his own mind, in deliberately attacking the life of his fovereign. I shall not ask him to what political constitution this doctrine can be reconciled. But, at least, it is incumbent upon him to thew, that the prefent King has better excuses, than Charles the First, for the errors of his government. He ought to demonstrate to us that the constitution was better understood a hundred years ago than it is at present; -that the legal rights of the subject, and the limits of the prerogative were more accurately defined, and more clearly comprehended. If propositions like these cannot be fairly maintained, I do not see how he can reconcile it to his conscience, not to act unmediately with the fame freedom with which he toeaks. I reverence the character of Charles the L 2 First First as little as Mr. Horne; but I will not infult his misfortunes, by a comparison that would degrade him.

It is worth observing, by what gentle degrees, the furious, persecuting zeal of Mr. Horne has softened into moderation. Men and measures were yesterday his object. What pains did he once take to bring that great state criminal Macquirk to execution!—To-day he confines himself to measures only.—No penal example is to be left to the successors of the Duke of Grafton.—To-morrow, I presume both men and measures will be forgiven. The slaming patriot, who so lately scorched us in the meridian, sinks temperately to the west, and is hardly selt as he descends.

I COMPREHEND the policy of endeavouring to communicate to Mr. Oliver and Mr. Sawbridge, a share in the reproaches, with which he supposes me to have loaded him. My memory fails me, if I have mentioned their names with disrespect;—unless it be reproachful to acknowledge a sincere respect for the character of Mr. Sawbridge, and not to have questioned the innocence of Mr. Oliver's intentions.

It feems I am a partizan of the great leader of the opposition. If the charge had been a reproach, it should have been better supported. I did not intend to make a public declaration of the respect I bear Lord Chatham. I well knew what unworthy conclusions would be drawn from it. But I am called upon to deliver my opinion, and surely it is not in the little censure of Mr. Horne to deter me from doing signal justice to a man, who, I confess, has grown upon my efteem. As for the common, fordid views of avarice, or any purpose of vulgar ambition, I question whether the applause of Funius would be of tervice to Lord Chatham. My vote will hardly recommend him to an increase of his pension, or to a feat in the cabinet. But if his ambition be upon a level with his understanding; if he judges of what is truly honourable for himfelf, with the fame fuperior genius, which animates and directs him, to eloquence in debate, to wifdom in decision, even the pen of Junius shall contribute to reward him. Recorded honours shall gather round his monument, and thicken over him. It is a folid fabric, and will support the laurels that adorn it.-I am not conversant in the language of panegyric. - These praises are extorted from me; but they will wear well, for they have been dearly earned.

My deteffation of the Duke of Grafton is not founded upon his treachery to any individual: though I am willing enough to suppose that, in public affairs, it would be impossible to desert or betray Lord Chatham, without doing an essential injury to this country. My abhorrence of the Duke arises from an intimate knowledge of his character, and from a thorough conviction, that his baseness has been the cause of greater mischief to England, than even the unfortunate ambition of Lord Bute.

THE shortening the duration of parliaments is a subject, on which Mr. Horne cannot enlarge too warmly; nor will I question his sincerity. If I did not profess the same sentiments, I should be shamefully inconsistent with myself. It is unnecessary to bind Lord Chatham by the written formality of an engagement. He has publicly declared himself a convert to Triennial Parliaments; and the I have long been convinced that this is the only possible refource we have left to preserve the substantial freedom of the constitution, I do not think we have a right to determine against the integrity of Lord Rockingham or his friends. Other measures may undoubtedly be supported in argument, as better adapted to the disorder, or more likely to be obtained.

MR. Horne is well affured, that I never was the champion of Mr. Wilkes. But though I am not obliged to answer for the firmness of his future adherence to the principles he professes, I have no reason to presume that he will hereafter disgrace them. As for all those imaginary cases, which Mr. Horne fo petulantly urges against me, I have one plain, honest answer to make to him. - Whenever Mr. Wilkes shall be convicted of soliciting a pension, an embassy, or a government, he must depart from that fituation, and renounce that character, which he assumes at present, and which, in my opinion, intitle him to the support of the public. By the same act, and at the same moment, he will forfeit his power of mortifying the King; and though he can never be a favourite at St. James's, his baseness may administer a solid satisfaction to the royal mind. The man, I speak of, has not a heart to feel for the frailties of his fellowcreatures. It is their virtues that afflict, it is their vices that confole him.

I GIVE every possible advantage to Mr. Horne, when I take the facts he refers to for granted. That they are the produce of his invention, feems highly probable; that they are exaggerated I have no doubt. At the worst, what do they amount to, but that Mr. Wilkes, who never was thought of as a perfect pattern of morality, has not been at all times proof against the extremity of distress? How shameful is it, in a man who has lived in friendthip with him, to reproach him with failings, too naturally connected with despair! Is no allowance to be made for banishment and ruin? Does a two years imprisonment make no atonement for his crimes?—The refentment of a priest is implacable. No fufferings can foften, no penitence can appeale him.-Yet he himself, I think, upon his own fystem, has a multitude of political offences to atone for. I will not infift upon the nauseous detail, with which he fo long difgusted the public. He feems to be ashamed of it. But what excuse will he make to the friends of the constitution for labouring to promote this confummately bad man to a station of the highest national trust and importance? Upon what honourable motives did he recommend him to the livery of London for their representative; -to the ward of Farringdon for their alderman; -to the county of Middlefex for their knight? Will he affirm that, at that time, he was ignorant of Mr. Wilkes's folicitations to the miniftry?-That he should say so, is indeed very neceffary for his own justification, but where will he find credulity to believe him?

In what school this gentleman learned his ethics I know not. His logic feems to have been fludied under Mr. Dyson. That miserable pamphleteer, by dividing the only precedent in point, and taking as much of it as fuited his purpose, had reduced his argument upon the Middlefex election to fomething like the shape of a syllogism. Mr. Horne has conducted himself with the same ingenuity and candour. I had affirmed that Mr. Wilkes would preserve the public favour, " as long as he flood "forth against a ministry and parliament, who " were doing every thing they could to enflave the country, and as long as he was a thorn in the "King's fide." Yet, from the exulting triumph of Mr. Horne's reply, one would think that I had rested my expectation, that Mr. Wilkes would be fupported by the public, upon the fingle condition of his mortifying the King. This may be logic at Cambridge or at the Treasury, but among men of fenfe and honour, it is folly or villainy in the extreme.

I see the pitiful advantage he has taken of a fingle unguarded expression, in a letter not intended for the public. Yet it is only the expression that is unguarded. I adhere to the true meaning of that member of the sentence, taken separately as he takes it, and now, upon the coolest deliberation, reassert that, for the purposes I referred to, it may be highly meritorious to the public, to wound the personal feelings of the Sovereign. It is not a general proposition, nor is it generally applied to the chief magistrate of this, or any other constitution. Mr. Horne knows as well as I do, that the best of princes princes is not displeased with the abuse, which he sees thrown upon his oftensible ministers. It makes them, I presume, more properly the objects of his royal compassion;—neither does it escape his sagacity, that the lower they are degraded in the public esteem, the more submissively they must depend upon his favour for protection. This, I affirm upon the most solemn conviction, and the most certain knowledge, is a leading maxim in the policy of the closet. It is unnecessary to pursue the argument any farther.

MR. Horne is now a very loyal subject. He laments the wretched state of politics in this country, and sees, in a new light, the weakness and solly of the opposition. Whoever or whatever is sovereign, demands the respect and support of the people*, it was not so, when Nero siddled while Rome was burning. Our gracious Sovereign has had wonderful success, in creating new attachments to his person and family. He owes it, I presume, to the regular system he has pursued in the mystery of conversion. He began with an experiment upon the Scotch, and concludes with converting Mr. Horne.—What a pity it is, that the Jews should be condemned by Providence to wait for a Messiah of their own!

THE priesthood are accused of misinterpreting the scriptures. Mr. Horne has improved upon his profession. He alters the text, and creates a refutable doctrine of his own. Such artifices cannot long delude the understanding of the people; and without meaning an indecent comparison, I may venture to foretel, that the Bible and funius will be read, when the commentaries of the Jesuits are forgotten.

^{*} The very soliloque of Lord Suffolk, before he passed the Rubicon.

JUNIUS.

LETTER LV.

TO THE PRINTER OF THE PUBLIC AD-VERTISER.

SIR. 26 August, 1771. HE enemies of the people, having now nothing better to object to my friend Junius, are at last obliged to quit his politics, and to rail at him for crimes he is not guilty of. His vanity and impiety are now the perpetual topics of their abuse. I do not mean to lessen the force of such charges, (supposing they were true), but to shew that they are not founded. If I admitted the premifes, I should readily agree in all the consequences drawn from them. Vanity indeed is a venial error, for it usually carries its own punishment with it ;-but if I thought Junius capable of uttering a difrespectful word of the religion of his country, I should be the first to renounce and give him up to the public contempt and indignation. As a man, I am satisfied that he is a Christian upon the most fincere conviction. As a writer, he would be grossly inconfistent with his political principles, if he dared to attack a religion established by those laws, which it feems to be the purpose of his life to defend.—Now for the proofs.— Junius is accused of an impious allufion to the holy facrament, where he

he fays that, if Lord Weymouth be denied the cup, there will be no keeping him within the pale of the ministry. Now, Sir, I affirm that this passage refers intirely to a ceremonial in the Roman catholic church, which denies the cup to the laity. It has no manner of relation to the Protestant creed, and is in this country, as fair an object of ridicule as transubstantiation, or any other part of Lord Peter's history in the Tale of the Tub.

BUT Junius is charged with equal vanity and impiety, in comparing his writings to the holy fcripture.-The formal protest he makes against any fuch comparison, avails him nothing. It becomes necessary then to shew that the charge destroys itfelf.-If he be vain, he cannot be impious. A vain man does not usually compare himself to an object, which it is his defign to undervalue. On the other hand, if he be impious, he cannot be vain. For his imprety, if any, must consist in his endeavouring to degrade the holy scriptures by a comparison with his own contemptible writings. This would be folly indeed of the groffest nature, but where lies the vanity?—I shall now be told,—" Sir, what " you say is plausible enough, but still you must ee allow that it is shamefully impudent in Junius to "tell us that his works will live as long as the Bi-" ble." My answer is, Agreed: but first prove that he has faid fo. Look at his words, and you will find that the utmost he expects is, that the Bible and Junius will furvive the commentaries of the Jesuits, which may prove true in a fortnight. The most malignant sagacity cannot shew that his works are, in his opinion, to live as long as the Bible.—Suppose I were to foretell that Jack and Tom would survive Harry.—Does it follow that Jack must live as long as Tom? I would only illustrate my meaning, and protest against the least idea of profaneness.

YET this is the way in which Junius is usually answered, arraigned and convicted. These candid critics never remember any thing he says in honour of our holy religion; though it is true that one of his leading arguments is made to rest upon the internal evidence which the purest of all religious carries with it. I quote his words, and conclude from them, that he is a true and hearty Christian, in substance, not in ceremony; though possibly he may not agree with my Reverend Lords the Bishops, or with the Head of the Church, that prayers are morality, or that kneeling is religion.

PHILO JUNIUS.

LETTER LVI.

FROM THE REVEREND MR. HORNE TO JUNIUS.

17 August, 1771.

I CONGRATULATE you, Sir, on the recovery of your wonted style, though it has cost you a fortnight. I compassionate your labour in the composition of your letters, and will communicate to you the secret of my sluency.—Truth needs no ornament; and, in my opinion, what she borrows of the pencil is deformity.

You brought a positive charge against me of corruption. I denied the charge, and called for your proofs. You replied with abuse and reafferted your charge. I called again for proofs.

You reply again with abuse only, and drop your accusation. In your fortnight's letter there is not one word upon the subject of my corruption.

I HAVE no more to fay, but to return thanks to you for your condescension, and to a grateful public and honest ministry for all the favours they have conferred upon me. The two latter, I am fure, will never refuse me any grace I shall solicit; and fince you have been pleased to acknowledge that you told a deliberate lye in my favour out of bounty, and as a charitable donation, why may I not expect that you will hereafter (if you do not forget you ever mentioned my name with difrespect) make the fame acknowledgment for what you have faid to my prejudice?-This second recantation will perhaps be more abhorrent from your disposition; but should you decline it, you will only afford one more instance how much easier it is to be generous than just, and that men are sometimes bountiful who are not honest.

Ar all events I am as well satisfied with your panegyric as Lord Chatham can be. Monument I shall have none; but over my grave it will be said, in your own words, "Horne's situation did not cor"respond with his intentions *."

JOHN HORNE.

^{*} The epitaph would not be ill fuited to the character; -At the beft, it is but equivocal.

LETTER LVII.

TO HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF GRAFTON.

MY LORD, 28 Sept. 1771. THE people of England are not apprifed of the full extent of their obligations to you. They have yet no adequate idea of the endless variety of your character. They have feen you diftinguished and fuccefsful in the continued violation of those moral and political duties, by which the little, as well as the great focieties of life, are collected and held together. Every colour, every character became you. With a rate of abilities, which Lord Weymouth very juftly looks down upon with contempt, you have done as much mischief to the community as Cromwell would have done, if Cromwell had been a coward, and as much as Machiavel, it Machiavel had not known, that an appearance of morals and religion is useful in fociety .-- To a thinking man, the influence of the crown will, in no view, appear to formidable, as when he observe to what enormous excesses it has safely conducted your Grace, without a ray of real understanding, without even the pretentions to common decency or principle of any kind, or a fingle spark of personal resolution. What must be the operation of that pernicious influence, (for which our Kings have wifely exchanged the nugatory name of prerogative) that, in the highest stations, can so abundantly supply the absence of virtue, courage, and abilities, and qualify a man to be the minister of a great nation, whom a private gentleman would be ashamed and afraid to admit into his family! Like the univerial paffport of an ambaffador, it superfedes the prohibition of the laws, banishes the staple virtues of the country, and introduces vice and folly triumphantly into all the departments of the state. Other princes, befides his Majesty, have had the means of corruption within their reach, but they have used it with moderation. In former times corruption was confidered as a foreign auxiliary to government, and only called in upon extraordinary emergencies. The unfeigned piety, the fanctified religion of George the Third have taught him to new model the civil forces of the state. The natural resources of the crown are no longer confided in. Corruption glitters in the van; -collects and maintains a standing army of mercenaries, and, at the same moment, impoverishes and inflaves the country. -His Majesty's predecessors, (excepting that worthy family, from which you, my Lord, are unquestionably descended,) had some generous qualities in their composition, with vices, I confess, or frailties in abundance. They were kings or gentlemen, not hypocrites or priefts. They were at the head of the church, but did not know the value of their office. They faid their prayers without ceremony, and had too little priestcraft in their understanding, to reconcile the fanctimonious forms of religion with the utter deflruction of the morality of their people. -- My Lord, this is fact, not declamation. - With all your partiality to the house of Stuart, you must confess, that even Charles the Second would have blushed at that open encouragement, at those eager, meretricious careffes, with which every species of private VICE vice and public profitution is received at St. James's .- The unfortunate house of Stuart has been treated with an afperity, which, if comparison be a defence, feems to border upon injustice. Neither Charles nor his brother were qualified to support fuch a system of measures, as would be necesfary, to change the government, and subvert the constitution of England. One of them was too much in earnest in his pleasures, -the other in his religion. But the danger to this country would cease to be problematical, if the crown should ever descend to a prince, whose apparent simplicity might throw his fubjects off their guard,-who might be no libertine in behaviour,-who should have no sense of honour to restrain him, and who, with just religion enough to impose upon the multitude, might have no scruples of conscience to interfere with his morality. With these honourable qualifications, and the decifive advantage of fituation, low craft and falsehood are all the abilities that are wanting to destroy the wisdom of ages, and to deface the noblest monument that human policy has erected-I know fuch a man; -My Lord, I know you both; and with the bleffing of God (for I too am religious,) the people of England shall know you as well as I do. I am not very fure that greater abilities would not in effect be an impediment to a defign, which feems at first fight to require a superior capacity. A better understanding might make him fenfible of the wonderful beauty of that fystem he was endeavouring to corrupt. The danger of the attempt might alarm him. The meanness, and intrinfic worthleffness of the object (supposing he could attain attain it) would fill him with shame, repentance, and difgust. But these are sensations, which find no entrance into a barbarous, contracted heart. In some men, there is a malignant passion to destroy the works of genius, literature, and freedom. The Vandal and the Monk find equal gratification in it.

REFLECTIONS like thefe, my Lord, have a general relation to your grace, and inseparably attend you, in whatever company or fituation your character occurs to us. They have no immediate connexion with the following recent fact, which I lay before the public, for the honour of the best of Sovereigns, and for the edification of his people.

A PRINCE (whose piety and felf-denial, one would think, might fecure him from fuch a multitude of worldly necessities,) with an annual revenue of near a million sterling, unfortunately wants money.—The navy of England, by an equally ftrange concurrence of unforeseen circumstances, (though not quite so unfortunately for his Majesty) is in equal want of timber. The world knows, in what a hopeful condition you delivered the navy to your fuccessor, and in what a condition we found it in the moment of diffress. You were determined it should continue in the situation in which you left it. It happened, however, very luckily for the privy purse, that one of the above wants promised fair to supply the other. Our religious, benevolent, generous Sovereign, has no objection to felling his own timber to his own admiralty, to repair his own ships, nor to putting the money into his own pocket. People of a religious turn naturally adhere to the principles of the church. Whatever they acquire falls into mortmain. Upon a representation from the admiralty of the extraordinary want of timber, for the indifpensable repairs of the navy, the furveyor general was directed to make a furvey of the timber in all the royal chaces and forests in England. Having obeyed his orders with accuracy and attention, he reported, that the finest timber he had any where met with, and the properest in every respect for the purposes of the navy, was in Whittlebury Forest, of which your Grace, I think, is hereditary ranger. In consequence of this report, the usual warrant was prepared at the treasury, and delivered to the furveyor, by which he or his deputy were authorifed to cut down any trees in Whittlebury Forest, which should appear to be proper for the purpoles above-mentioned. The deputy being informed that the warrant was figned and delivered to his principal in London, croffes the country to Northamptonshire, and with an officious zeal for the public fervice, begins to do his duty in the forest. Unfortunately for him, he had not the warrant in his pocket. The overfight was enormous, and you have punished him for it accordingly. You have infifted that an active, useful officer should be dismissed from his place. You have ruined an innocent man, and his family .- In what language shall ! address so black, so cowardly a tyrant; - thou worse than one of the Brunswicks, and all the Stuarts !-To them, who know Lord North, it is unnecessary to fay, that he was mean and base enough to submi to you. - This however is but a fmall part of the fact. After ruining the furveyor's deputy, for alling without the warrant, you attacked the warrant itself. You declared it was illegal, and fwore in a fit of foaming, frantic pattion, that it never should be executed. You afferted upon your honour, that in the grant of the rangership of Whittlebury Forest, made by Charles the Second, (whom, with a modesty that would do honour to Mr. Rigby, you are pleased to call your ancestor) to one of his bastards, (from whom I make no doubt of your defcent,) the property of the timber is vested in the tanger .- I have examined the original grant, and now, in the face of the public, contradict you directly upon the fact. The very reverse, of what you have afferted upon your honour is the truth. The grant expressly, and by a particular clause, referves the property of the timber for the use of the crown.-In spite of this evidence,-in defiance of the representations of the admiralty,-in perfect mockery of the notorious distresses of the English navy, and those equally preffing, and almost equally notorious necessities of your pious Sovereign, -here the matter rests.—The lords of the treasury recal their warrant; the deputy-furveyor is ruined for doing his duty; -Mr. John Pitt, (whose name I suppose is offensive to you) submits to be browbeaten and infulted; -the oaks keep their ground; -the King is defrauded, and the navy of England may perish for want of the best and finest timber in the illand. And all this is submitted to-to appeale the Duke of Grafton!-To gratify the man, who has involved the King and his kingdom in confusion and diffrefs, and who, like a treacherous coward, deferted his Sovereign in the midst of it!

THERE has been a strange alteration in your doctrines, fince you thought it adviseable to rob the Duke of Portland of his property, in order to strengthen the interest of Lord Bute's fon-in-law, before the last general election. Nullum tempus occurrit regi, was then your boasted motto, and the cry of all your hungry partizans. Now it feems a grant of Charles the Second to one of his bastards is to be held facred and inviolable! It must not be queftioned by the King's fervants, nor fubmitted to any interpretation but your own.-My Lord, this was not the language you held, when it fuited you to infult the memory of the glorious deliverer of England from that detested family, to which you are fill more nearly allied in principle than in blood. -In the name of decency and common-fense, what are your grace's merits, either with King or miniftry, that should intitle you to assume this domineering authority over both ?- Is it the fortunate confanguinity you claim with the house of Stuart ?- 15 it the fecret correspondence you have for so many years carried on with Lord Bute, by the affiduous affistance of your cream coloured parafite? -- Could not your gallantry find fufficient employment for him, in those gentle offices by which he first acquired the tender friendship of Lord Barrington? - Or is it only that wonderful sympathy of manners, which subfists between your Grace and one of your superiors, and does fo much honour to you both? - Is the union of Blift and Black George no longer a romance?-From whatever origin your influence in this country arises, it is a phomenon in the history of human virtue and understanding .- Good men can hardly believe the the fact. Wife men are unable to account for it. Religious men find exercise for their faith, and make it the last effort of their piety, not to repine against Providence.

IUNIUS.

LETTER LVIII.

ADDRESSED TO THE LIVERYOF LONDON.

GENTLEMEN. 30 Sept. 1771. FF you alone were concerned in the event of the present election of a chief magistrate of the metropolis, it would be the highest presumption in a ftranger, to attempt to influence your choice, or even to offer you his opinion. But the fituation of public affairs has annexed an extraordinary importance to your refolutions. You cannot, in the choice of your magistrate, determine for your felves only. You are going to determine upon a point, in which every member of the community is interested. I will not scruple to say, that the very being of that law, of that right, of that constitution, for which we have been fo long contending, is now at stake. They, who would enfoare your judgment, tell you, it is a common, ordinary case, and to be decided by ordinary precedent and practice. They artfully conclude, from moderate peaceable times, to times which are not moderate, and which ought not to be peaceable.-While they folicit your favour, they infift upon a rule of rotation, which excludes all idea of election.

LET me be honoured with a few mirutes of your attention.—The question, to those who mean fairly to the liberty of the people, (which we all profess to have in view) lies within a very narrow compass.-Do you mean to defert that just and honourable syftem of measures which you have hitherto pursued, in hopes of obtaining from parliament or from the crown, a full redrefs of past grievances, and a security for the future?-Do you think the cause defperate, and will you declare, that you think fo to the whole people of England?—If this be your meaning and opinion, you will act confiftently with it, in choosing Mr. Nash.—I profess to be unacquainted with his private character. But he has acted as a magistrate, -as a public man .- As such I fpeak of him,-I fee his name in a protest against one of your remonstrances to the crown. - He has done every thing in his power to destroy the freedom of popular elections in the city by publishing the poll upon a former occasion; and I know, in general, that he has distinguished himself by slighting and thwarting all those public measures, which you have engaged in with the greatest warmth, and hitherto thought most worthy of your approbation -From his past conduct, what conclusion will you draw, but that he will act the same part as Lord Mayor, which he has invariably acted as Alderman and Sheriff? He cannot alter his conduct, without confessing that he never acted upon principle of any kind .- I should be forry to injure the character of a man, who perhaps may be honest in his intention, by supposing it possible, that he can never concur with you in any political measure, or opinion.

Ir, on the other hand, you mean to perfevere in those resolutions for the public good, which though not always fuccefsful, are always honourable, your choice will naturally incline to those men, who, (whatever they be in other respects,) are most likely to cooperate with you in the great purpofes which you are determined not to relinquish :- The question is not, of what metal your instruments are made, but whether they are adapted to the work you have in hand? The honours of the city, in thefe times, are improperly, because exclusively, called a reward. You mean not merely to pay, but to employ .- Are Mr. Crofby and Mr. Sawbridge likely to execute the extraordinary, as well as the ordinary duties of Lord Mayor?-Will they grant you common halls when it shall be necessary?-Will they go up with remonstrances to the King?-Have they firmness enough to meet the fury of a venal house of commons?-Have they fortitude enough not to fhrink at imprisonment?-Have they spirit enough to hazard their lives and fortunes in a contest, if it should be necessary, with a prostituted legislature?-If these questions can fairly be anfwered in the affirmative, your choice is made. Forgive this passionate language. - I am unable to correct it. - The subject comes home to us all .- It is the language of my heart.

JUNIUS.

LETTER LIX.

TO THE PRINTER OF THE PUBLIC AD-VERTISER.

SIR, 5 October, 1771. TO man laments, more fincerely than I do, the IN unhappy differences, which have arisen among the friends of the people, and divided them from each other. The cause undoubtedly suffers, as well by the diminution of that strength, which union carries with it, as by the separate loss of personal reputation, which every man fustains, when his character and conduct are frequently held forth in odious or contemptible colours .- These differences are only advantageous to the common enemy of the country.- The hearty friends of the cause are provoked and difgusted .- The lukewarm advocate avails himself of any pretence to relapse into that indolent indifference about every thing that ought to interest an Englishman, so unjustly dignified with the title of moderation .- The falle, infidious partifan, who creates or foments the diforder, fees the fruit of his dishonest industry ripen beyond his hopes, and rejoices in the promife of a banquet, only delicious to such an appetite as his own.-It is time for those, who really mean the Cause and the People, who have no view to private advantage, and who have virtue enough to prefer the general good of the community to the gratification of personal animofities,-it is time for such men to interpose. -Let us try whether these Istal dissentions may not yet be reconciled; or, if that be impracticable, let us guard at least against the worst effects of division, and endeavour to persuade these furious partizans, if they will not confent to draw together, to be feparately useful to that cause, which they all pretend to be attached to .- Honour and honesty must not be renounced, although a thousand modes of right and wrong were to occupy the degrees of morality between Zeno and Epicurus. The fundamental principles of Christianity may still be preserved, though every zealous sectary adheres to his own exclusive doctrine, and pious Ecclesiastics make it part of their religion to profecute one another .- The civil constitution too, that legal liberty, that general creed, which every Englishman professes, may still be supported, though Wilkes, and Horne, and Townsend, and Sawbridge, should obstinately refuse to communicate, and even if the fathers of the church, if Savil, Richmond, Camden, Rockingham, and Chatham, should disagree in the ceremonies of their political worship, and even in the interpretation of twenty texts in Magna Charta.-I speak to the people as one of the people.-Let us employ these men in whatever departments their various abilities are best suited to, and as much to the advantage of the common cause, as their different inclinations will permit. They cannot ferve us, without effentially ferving themselves.

If Mr. Nash be elected, he will hardly venture, after so recent a mark of the personal esteem of his sellow-citizens, to declare himself immediately a courtier. The spirit and activity of the sheriffs will, shope, be sufficient to counteract any sinister intentions of the Lord-Mayor. In collision with their virtue, perhaps he may take fire.

Ir is not necessary to exact from Mr. Wilkes the virtues of a Stoic. They were inconfishent with themselves, who, almost at the same moment, represented him as the basest of mankind, yet seemed to expect from him fuch instances of fortitude and felf-denial, as would do honour to an apostle. It is not however flattery to fay, that he is obstinate. intrepid, and fertile in expedients .- That he has no possible resource, but in the public favour, is, in my judgment, a confiderable recommendation of him. I wish that every man, who pretended to popularity, were in the same predicament. I wish that a retreat to St. James's were not fo easy and open. as Patriots have found it. To Mr. Wilkes there is no access. However he may be milled by passion or imprudence, I think he cannot be guilty of a deliberate treachery to the public. The favour of his country constitutes the shield, which defends him against a thousand daggers. Desertion would disarm him.

I CAN more readily admire the liberal spirit and integrity, than the sound judgment of any man, who prefers a republican form of government, in this or any other empire of equal extent, to a monarchy so qualified and limited as ours. I am convinced, that neither is it in theory the wifest system of government, nor practicable in this country. Yet, though I hope the English constitution will for ever preserve its original monarchical form, I would have the manners of the people purely and strictly republican.—I do not mean the licentious spirit spirit of anarchy and riot .- I mean a general attachment to the common weal, distinct from any partial attachment to persons or families; -- an implicit submission to the laws only, and an affection to the magistrate, proportioned to the integrity and wisdom, with which he distributes justice to his people, and administers their affairs. The present habit of our political body appears to me the very reverse of what it ought to be. The form of the constitution leans rather more than enough to the popular branch; while, in effect, the manners of the people (of those at least who are likely to take a lead in the country) incline too generally to a dependance upon the crown. The real friends of arbitrary power combine the facts, and are not inconfistent with their principles, when they strenuoufly support the unwarrantable privileges assumed by the House of Commons. - In these circumstances, it were much to be defired, that we had many such men as Mr. Sawbridge to represent us in parliament.-I fpeak from common report and opinion only, when I impute to him a speculative predilection in favour of a republic. - In the personal conduct and manners of the man, I cannot be mistaken. He has shewn himself possessed of that republican firmness, which the times require, and by which an English gentleman may be as usefully and as honourably distinguished, as any citizen of ancient Rome, of Athens, or Lacedæmon.

MR. Townsend complains, that the public gratitude has not been answerable to his deserts.—It is not difficult to trace the artifices, which have suggested to him a language, so unworthy of his understanding.

standing. A great man commands the affections of the people. A prudent man does not complain when he has lost them. Yet they are far from being lost to Mr. Townsend. He has treated our opinion a little too cavalierly. A young man is apt to rely too considently upon himself, to be as attentive to his mistress, as a polite and passionate lover ought to be. Perhaps he found her at first too easy a conquest.—Yet, I fancy, she will be ready to receive him, whenever he thinks proper to renew his address. With all his youth, his spirit, and his appearance, it would be indecent in the lady to solicit his return.

I HAVE too much respect for the abilities of Mr. Horne, to flatter myfelf that these gentlemen will ever be cordially re-united. It is not, however, unreasonable to expect, that each of them should act his feparate part, with honour and integrity to the public. - As for differences of opinion upon speculative questions, if we wait until they are reconciled, the action of human affairs must be suspended for ever. But neither are we to look for perfection in any one man, nor for agreement among many .-When Lord Chatham affirms, that the authority of the British legislature is not supreme over the colonies, in the fame fense in which it is supreme over Great-Britain; -- when Lord Camden supposes a necessity, (which the King is to judge of) and, founded upon that necessity, attributes to the crown a legal power (not given by the act itself) to suspend the operation of an act of the legislature, -- I listen to them both with diffidence and respect, but without the smallest degree of conviction or assent.

Yet. I doubt not, they delivered their real fentiments, nor ought they to be haftily condemned .- I too have a claim to the candid interpretation of my country, when I acknowledge an involuntary, compullive affent to one very unpopular opinion. I lament the unhappy necessity, whenever it arises, of providing for the fafety of the state, by a temporary invation of the personal liberty of the subject. Would to God it were practicable to reconcile these important objects, in every possible situation of pubhe affairs!-I regard the legal liberty of the meanest man in Britain, as much as my own, and would defend it with the same zeal. I know we must stand or fall together. But I never can doubt, that the community has a right to command, as well as to purchase, the service of its members. I see that right founded originally upon a necessity, which superfedes all argument. I see it established by usage immemorial, and admitted by more than a tacit affent of the legislature. I conclude there is no remedy, in the nature of things, for the grievance complained of; for, if there were, it must long fince have been redressed. Though numberless opportunities have prefented themselves, highly favourable to public liberty, no fuccessful attempt has ever been made for the relief of the subject in this article. Yet it has been felt and complained of, ever fince England had a navy. - The conditions, which constitute this right, must be taken together. Separately, they have little weight. It is not fair to argue, from any abuse in the execution, to the illegality of the power; much less is a conclusion to be drawn from the navy to the land fervice. A fea-

man can never be employed but against the enemies of his country. The only case in which the King can have a right to arm his fubicats in general, is that of a foreign force being actually landed upon our coaft. Whenever that case happens, no true Englishman will enquire, whether the King's right to compel him to defend his country be the cufforn of England, or a grant of the legillature. With regard to the press for seamen, it does not follow that the symptoms may not be fostened, although the diftemper cannot be cured. Let bounties be increafed as fat as the public purfe can support them. Still they have a limit; and when every reasonable expence is incurred, it will be found, in fact, that the four of the press is wanted to give operation to the bounty.

Uron the whole, I never had a doubt about the frict right of preffing, until I heard that Lord Mansheld had applauded Lord Chatham for delivering fomething like this doctrine in the house of That confideration staggered me not a little. But, upon reflection, his conduct accounts naturally for itself. He knew the doctrine was unpopular, and was eager to fix it upon the man, who is the first object of his fear and detestation. The cunning Scotchman never speaks truth without a fraudulent design. In council, he generally affects to take a moderate part. Besides his natural timidity, it makes part of his political plan, never to be known to recommend violent measures. When the guards are called forth to murder their fellow fubjects, it is not by the offenfible advice of Loid Mansfield. That edious office, his prudence tells him.

him, is better left to such men as Gower and Weymouth, as Barrington and Grafton Lord Hillfborough wifely confines his firmness to the distant Americans.-The defigns of Mansfield are more subtile, more effectual, and secure .-- Who attacks the liberty of the preis?-Lord Mansfield .-Who invades the constitutional power of juries?-Lord Mansfield.-What judge ever challenged a juryman, but Lord Mansfield ?- Who was that judge, who, to fave the King's brother, affirmed that a man of the first rank and quality, who obtains a verdict in a fuit for crimnal conversation, is entitled to no greater damages than the meanest mechanic?--Lord Mansfield.--Who is it makes commissioners of the great feal?-Lord Mansfield.-Who is it forms a decree for those commissioners, deciding against Lord Charham, and afterwards (finding himself opposed by the judges) declares in parliament, that he never had a doubt that the law was in direct opposition to that decree ?- Lord Mansfield. -Who is he, that has made it the fludy and practice of his life, to undermine and alter the whole fyflem of jurisprudence in the court of King's Bench? -Lord Mansfield. There never existed a man but himself, who answered exactly to so complicated a description. Compared to these enormities, his original attachment to the Pretender, (to whom his dearest brother was confidential fecretary) is a virtua of the first magnitude. But the hour of impeachment will come, and neither he nor Grafton shall escape me. Now let them make common cause against England and the house of Hanover. A Stuart Stuart and a Murray should sympathise with each other.

WHEN I refer to fignal inflances of unpopular opinions delivered and maintained by men, who may well be supposed to have no view but the public good, I do not mean to renew the discussion of such opinions. I should be forry to revive the dormant questions of Stamp-a&, Corn-bill, or Press-warrant. I mean only to illustrate one useful proposition, which it is the intention of this paper to inculcate: -That we should not generally reject the friendship or fervices of any man, because he differs from us in a particular opinion. This will not appear a superfluous caution, if we observe the ordinary conduct of mankind. In public affairs, there is the least chance of a perfect concurrence of fentiment, or inclination. Yet every man is able to contribute fomething to the common flock, and no man's contribution should be rejected. If individuals have no virtues. their vices may be of use to us. I care not with what principle the new-born patriot is animated, if the measures he supports are beneficial to the community. The nation is interested in his conduct. His motives are his own. The properties of a patriot are perishable in the individual, but there is a quick fuccession of subjects, and the breed is worth preserving.-The spirit of the Americans may be an useful example to us. Our dogs and horses are only English upon English ground; but patriotism. it feems, may be improved by transplanting. - I will not reject a bill, which tends to confine parliamentary privilege within reasonable bounds, though it should be stolen from the house of Cavendish, and introduced introduced by Mr. Onflow. The features of the infant are a proof of the descent, and vindicate the noble birth from the baseness of the adoption .- I willingly accept of a farcaim from Colonel Barre, or a fimile from Mr. Burke. Even the filent vote of Mr. Calcraft is worth reckoning in a division .-What though he riots in the plunder of the army, and has only determined to be a patriot, when he could not be a peer?-Let us profit by the affistance of fuch men, while they are with us, and place them, if it be possible, in the post of danger, to prevent defertion. The wary Wedderburne, the pompous Suffolk never threw away the scabbard, nor ever went upon a forlorn hope. They always treated the King's fervants as men, with whom, fome time or other, they might possibly be in friendship .-When a man who stands forth for the public, has gone that length, from which there is no practicable retreat,-when he has given that kind of personal offence, which a pious monarch never pardons, I then begin to think him in earnest, and that he never will have occasion to solicit the forgiveness of his country.—But instances of a determination so entire and unreserved are rarely met with. Let us take mankind, as they are. Let us diffribute the virtues and abilities of individuals, according to the offices they affect, and when they quit the service, let us endeavour to supply their places with better men than we have loft. In this country, there are always candidates enough for popular favour. The temple of fame is the shortest passage to riches and preferment.

ABOVE all things, let me guard my countrymen against the meanness and folly of accepting of a trifling or moderate compensation for extraordinary and effential injuries. Our enemies treat us, as the cunning trader does the unskilful Indian. They magnify their generofity, when they give us baubles, of little proportionate value, for ivory and gold. The fame house of commons, who robbed the constituent body of their right of free election, who prefumed to make a law under pretence of declaring it. who paid our good King's debts, without once enquiring how they were incurred; who gave thanks for repeated murders committed at home, and for national infamy incurred abroad; who screened Lord Mansfield; who imprisoned the magistrates of the metropolis, for afferting the subjects right to the protection of the laws; who erased a judicial record, and ordered all proceedings in a criminal fuit to be fuspended; - this very house of commons have graciously confented, that their own members may be compelled to pay their debts, and that contested elections shall for the future be determined with some decent regard to the merits of the case. The event of the fuit is of no confequence to the crown. While parliaments are septennial, the purchase of the sitting member or of the petitioner makes but the difference of a day .- Concessions, fuch as these, are of little moment to the fum of things; unless it be to prove, that the worst of men are fensible of the injuries they have done us, and perhaps to demonstrate to us the imminent danger of our fituation. In the shipwreck of the state, trifles float and are preferved; while every thing folid and valuable finks to the bottom, and is loft for ever.

JUNIUS.

LETTER LX.

TO THE PRINTER OF THE PUBLIC AD-

SIR, 15 October, 1771.

T A M convinced that Funius is incapable of wil-

I AM convinced that Junius is incapable of wil-I fully misrepresenting any man's opinion, and that his inclination leads him to treat Lord Camden with particular candour and respect. The doctrine attributed to him by Junius, as far as it goes, correfponds with that stated by your correspondent Scavola, who feems to make a distinction without a difference. Lord Camden, it is agreed, did certainly maintain that, in the recess of parliament, the King, (by which we all mean the King in council, or the executive power) might suspend the operation of an act of the legislature; and he founded his doctrine upon a supposed necessity, of which the King, in the first instance, must be judge. The lords and commons cannot be judges of it in the first instance, for they do not exist. - Thus far Junius.

Bur, says Scavola, Lord Camden made parliament, and not the King, judges of the necessity.—That parliament may review the acts of ministers is unquestionable; but there is a wide difference between saying that the crown has a legal power, and, that ministers may act at their peril. When we say an act is illegal, we mean that it is forbidden by a joint resolution of the three estates. How a subsequent resolution of two of those branches can make it legal ab initio, will require explanation. If it could, the confequence would be truly dreadful, especially in these times. There is no act of arbitrary power, which the King might not attribute to necessity, and for which he would not be fecure of obtaining the approbation of his profituted lords and commons. If Lord Camden admits that the subsequent fanction of parliament was necessary to make the proclamation legal, why did he so obstinately oppose the bill, which was foon after brought in, for indemnifying all those persons, who had acted under it?-If that bill had not been passed, I am ready to maintain, in direct contradiction to Lord Camden's doctrine, (taken as Scavola states it) that a litigious exporter of corn, who had suffered in his property in confequence of the proclamation, might have laid his action against the custom-house officers, and would infallibly have recovered damages. No jury could refuse them; and if I, who am by no means lingious, had been fo injured, I would affuredly have inflituted a fuit in Westminster-hall, on purpose to try the question of right. I would have done it upon a principle of defiance of the pretended power of either or both houses to make declarations inconfiltent with law, and I have no doubt, that, with an . act of parliament of my fide, I should have been too ftrong for them all. This is the way, in which an Englishman should speak and act, and not suffer dangerous precedents to be established, because the circumstances are favourable or palliating. WITH

N 2

WITH regard to Lord Camden, the truth is, that he inadvertently over-shot himself, as appears plainly by that unguarded mention of a tyranny of forty days, which I myself heard. Instead of asserting that the proclamation was legal, he should have said, "My lords, I know the proclamation was illegal, but I advised it because it was indispensably necessary to save the kingdom from samine, and I submit myself to the justice and mercy of my country."

Such language as this would have been manly, rational, and confistent:—not unfit for a lawyer, and every way worthy of a great man.

PHILO JUNIUS.

P. S. Ir Scavola should think proper to write again upon this subject, I beg of him to give me a direct answer, that is, a plain affirmative or negative, to the following questions:-In the interval between the publishing such a proclamation (or order of council) as that in question, and its receiving the fanction of the two houses, of what nature is it-is it legal or illegal; or is it neither one nor the other?-I mean to be candid, and will point out to him the confequence of his answer either way. - If it be legal, it wants no farther fanction. If it be illegal, the subject is not bound to obey it, consequently it is a useless, nugatory act, even as to its declared purpose. Before the meeting of parliament, the whole mischief, which it means to prevent, will have been compleated.

LETTER LXI.

TO ZENO.

THE sophistry of your letter in defence of Lord Mansfield is adapted to the character you defend. But Lord Mansfield is a man of form, and seldom in his behaviour transgresses the rules of decorum. I shall imitate his lordship's good manners, and leave you in the full possession of his principles. I will not call you liar, jesuit, or villain; but, with all the politeness imaginable, perhaps I may prove you so.

LIKE other fair pleaders in Lord Mansfield's school of justice, you answer Junius by misquoting his words, and mistaking his propositions. If I am candid enough to admit that this is the very logic taught at St. Omer's, you will readily allow that it is the constant practice in the court of King's Bench. -Junius does not fay, that he never had a doubt about the strict right of pressing, till he knew Lord Mansfield was of the same opinion. His words are, until he heard that Lord Mansfield had applauded Lord Chatham for maintaining that doctrine in the house of lords. It was not the accidental concurrence of Lord Mansfield's opinion, but the suspicious applause given by a cunning Scotchman to the man he detests, that raised and justified a doubt in the mind of Junius. The question is not, whether Lord Mansfield be a man of learning and abilities (which Junius has never disputed,) but whether or no he abuses and misapplies his talents. Tunius.

Junius did not fay that Lord Mansfield had advifed the calling out the guards. On the contrary, his plain meaning is, that he left that odious office to men less cunning than himself .- Whether Lord Mansfield's doctrine concerning libels be or be not an attack upon the liberty of the press, is a question, which the public in general are very well able to determine. I shall not enter into it at present. Nor do I think it necessary to say much to a man, who had the daring confidence to fay to a jury, "Gen-"tlemen, you are to bring in a verdict, guilty or " not guilty, but whether the defendant be guilty or "innocent is not matter for your confideration." Cloath it in what language you will, this is the fum total of Lord Mansfield's doctrine. If not, let Zeno thew us the difference.

But it feems, the liberty of the press may be abufed, and the abuse of a valuable privilege is the certain means to lofe it. The first I admit, -but let the abufe be submitted to a jury, a sufficient and indeed the only legal and constitutional check upon the licence of the press. The fecond, I flatly deny. In direct contradiction to Lord Mansfield I affirm that, " the " abuse of a valuable privilege is not the certain " means to lose it." If it were, the English nation would have few privileges left, for where is the privilege that has not, at one time or other, been abused by individuals? But it is false in reason and equity, that particular abuses should produce a general forfeiture. Shall the community be deprived of the protection of the laws because there are robbers and murderers?—Shall the community be punished, because individuals have offended? Lord Mansfield NA

Mansfield fays so, confishently enough with his principles, but I wonder to find him so explicit. Yet, for one concession, however extorted, I confess my felf obliged to him.—The liberty of the press is after all a valuable privilege. I agree with him most heartily, and will defend it against him.

You ask me, What juryman was challenged by Lord Mansfield? - I tell you, his name was Benfon. When his name was called, Lord Mansfield ordered the clerk to pass him by. As for his reasons, you may ask himself, for he assigned none. But I can tell you what all men thought of it. This Benfor had been refractory upon a former jury, and would not accept of the law as delivered by Lord Mansfield; but had the impudence to pretend to think for himfelf .- But you it feems, honest Zeno, know nothing of the matter! You never read Junius's letter to your patron! You never heard of the intended instructions from the city to impeach Lord Mansfield !- You never heard by what dexterity of Mr. Pater fon that measure was prevented! How wonderfully ill fome people are informed!

Junius did never affirm that the crime, of seducing the wife of a mechanic or a peer, is not the same, taken in a moral or religious view. What he affirmed in contradiction to the levelling principle so lately adopted by Lord Manssield was, that the damages should be proportioned to the rank and fortune of the parties; and for this plain reason; (admitted by every other judge that ever sat in Westminster Hall) because, what is a compensation or penalty to one man is none to another. The sophistical distinction tinction you attempt to draw between the person injured, and the person injuring is Mansfield all over. If you can once establish the proposition that the injured party is not entitled to receive large damages, it follows pretty plainly that the party injuring should not be compelled to pay them; consequently the King's brother is effectually screened by Lord Mansfield's doctrine. Your reference to Nathan and David come naturally in aid of your patron's professed system of jurisprudence. He is fond of introducing into the court of King's Bench any law that contradicts or excludes the common law of England; whether it be canon, civil, jus gentium, or levitical. But, Sir, the Bible is the code of our religious faith, not of our municipal jurisprudence; and though it was the pleasure of God to inflict a particular punishment upon David's crime (taken as a breach of his divine commands) and to fend his prophet to denounce it, an English jury hath nothing to do either with David or the prophet. They confider the crime, only as it is a breach of order, an injury to an individual, and an offence to fociety, and they judge of it by certain positive rules of law, or by the practice of their ancestors. Upon the whole, the man, after God's own heart is much indebted to you for comparing him to the duke of Cumberland. That his royal highness may be the man after Lord Mansfield's own heart feems much more probable, and you I think, Mr. Zeno, might increed tolerably well in the character of Nathan. The evil deity, the prophet, and the royal finner would be very proper company for one another.

You say Lord Mansfield did not make the commissioners rnissioners of the Great Seal, and that he only advised the King to appoint. I believe Junius meant no more, and the distinction is hardly worth disputing.-

You say he did not deliver an opinion upon Lord Chatham's appeal.—I affirm that he did, directly in sayour of the appeal. This is a point of sact, to be determined by evidence only. But you assign no reason for his supposed silence, nor for his desiring a conference with the judges the day before. Was not all Westminster-hall convinced that he did it with a view to puzzle them with some perplexing question, and in hopes of bringing some of them over to him?—You say the commissioners were very capable of framing a decree for themselves. By the sact, it only appears, that they were capable of framing an illegal one, which, I apprehend, is not much to the credit either of their learning or integrity.

WE are both agreed that Lord Mansfield has incessantly laboured to introduce new modes of proceeding in the court where he presides; but you attribute it to an honest zeal in behalf of innocence oppressed by quibble and chicane. I say that he has introduced new law too, and removed the landmarks established by sormer decisions. I say that his view is to change a court of common law into a court of equity, and to bring every thing within the arbitrium of a pratorian court. The public must determine between us. But now for his merits. First then, the establishment of the judges in their places for life, (which you tell us was advised by Lord Manssieid) was a concession merely to catch the people. It bore the appearance of a royal bounty, but had nothing real in it. The judges were already for life, excepting in case of a demise. Your boasted bill only provides that it shall not be in the power of the King's fuccessor to remove them. At the best therefore, it is only a legacy, not a gift on the part of his prelent Majesty, fince for himself, he gives up nothing. -That he did oppose Lord Camden and Lord Northington upon the proclamation against the exportation of corn, is most true, and with great ability. With his talents, and taking the right fide of fo clear a question, it was impossible to speakill. --His motives are not so easily penetrated. They, who are acquainted with the state of politics, at that period, will judge of them somewhat differently from Zeno. One of the popular bills, which you fay he supported in the house of lords, the most material is undoubtedly that of Mr. Grenville, for deciding contested elections. But I should be glad to know upon what possible pretence any member of the upper house could oppose such a bill, after it had passed the house of commons?—I do not pretend to know what share he had in promoting the other two bills, but I am ready to give him all the credit you defire. Still you will find that a whole life of deliberate iniquity is ill atoned for by doing now and then a laudable action upon a mixed or doubtful principle.-If it be unworthy of him, thus ungratefully treated, to labour any longer for the public, in God's name let him retire. His brother's patron, (whose health he once was anxious for) is dead, but the fon of that unfortunate prince survives, and, I dare say, will be ready to receive him. PHILO JUNIUS.

LFT-

LETTER LXII.

TO AN ADVOCATE IN THE CAUSE OF THE PEOPLE.

SIR.

18 October, 1771.

YOU do not treat Junius fairly. You would 1. not have condemned him so hallily, if you had ever read Judge Foster's argument upon the legality of preffing feamen. A man who has not read that argument, is not qualified to fpeak accurately upon the fubject. In answer to strong facts and fair reasoning, you produce nothing but a vague comparison between two things, which have little or no refemblance to each other. General Warrants, it is true, had been often iffued, but they had never been regularly questioned or refisted, until the case of Mr. Wilkes. He brought them to trial, and the moment they were tried, they were declared illegal. This is not the case of Press Warrants. They have been complained of, questioned, and refisted in a thousand instances; but still the legislature have never interposed, nor has there ever been a formal decision against them in any of the superior courts. On the contrary, they have been frequently recognized and admitted by parliament, and there are judicial opinions given in their favour, by judges of the first character. Under the various circumstances, flated by Junius, he has a right to conclude, for himself, that there is no remedy. If you have a good one to propose, you may depend upon the asfistance and applause of Junius. The magistrate, who guards the liberty of the individual, deferves also his duty to provide for, or at least not to hazard the safety of the community. If, in the case of a foreign war and the expectation of an invasion, you would rather keep your sleet in harbour, than man it by pressing seamen, who refuse the bounty, I have done.

You talk of disbanding the army with wonderful ease and indifference. If a wiser man held fuch language, I should be apt to suspect his since-

rity

As for keeping up a much greater number of feamen in time of peace, it is not to be done. You will oppress the merchant, you will distress trade, and destroy the nursery of your seamen. He must be a miserable statesman, who voluntarily, by the same act increases the public expence, and lessens the means of supporting it.

PHILO JUNIUS.

LETTER LXIII.

22 October, 1771.

A FRIEND of Junius desires it may be observed, in answer to A Barrister at Law,) ordered a juryman to be passed by (which poor Zenz never heard of) is now formally admitted. When Mr. Benson's name was called, Lord Mansfield was observed to flush in the face, (a signal of guilt not uncommon with him) and cried out, Pass him by. This I take to be something more than a peremptory challenge. It is an unlawful command, without any reason assigned. That the council did not refift, is true; but this might happen either from inadvertence, or a criminal complaifance to Lord Mansfield.—You Barristers are too apt to be civil to my Lord Chief Justice, at the expence of your clients.

20. Junius did never say that Lord Mansfield had destroyed the liberty of the press. "That his "lordship has laboured to destroy,—that his doctrine "is an attack upon the liberty of the press,—that it is an invasion of the right of juries," are the propositions maintained by Junius. His opponents never answer him in point, for they never meet him fairly upon his own ground,

3°. Lord Mansfield's policy, in endeavouring to screen his unconstitutional doctrines behind an act of the legislature, is easily understood.—Let every Englishman stand upon his guard;—the right of juries to return a general verdict, in all cases what-soever, is a part of our constitution. It stands in no need of a bill, either enacting or declaratory, to confirm it.

4°. WITH regard to the Grofvenor cause, it is pleasant to observe that the doctrine attributed by Junius to Lord Mansfield, is admitted by Zeno and directly defended. The Barrister has not the assurance to deny it statly, but he evades the charge and softens the doctrine by such poor, contemptible quibbles, as cannot impose upon the meanest understanding.

5°. The quantity of business in the court of King's Bench proves nothing but the litigious spirit of the people, arising from the great increase of wealth and commerce. These however are now upon the decline, and will foon leave nothing but law fuits behind them. When Junius affirms that Lord Mansfield has laboured to alter the fystem of jurisprudence, in the court where his lordship prefides, he fpeaks to those, who are able to look a little farther than the vulgar. Besides that the multitude are eafily deceived by the imposing names of equity and substantial justice, it does not follow that a judge, who introduces into his court new modes of proceeding, and new principles of law, intends, in every instance, to decide unjustly. Why should he, where he has no interest?-We say that Lord Mansfield is a bad man, and a worse judge; -but we do not fay he is a mere devil. Our adverfaries would fain reduce us to the difficulty of proving too much .- This artifice however shall not avail him. The truth of the matter is plainly this. When Lord. Mansfield has succeeded in his scheme of changing a court of common law to a court of equity, he will have it in his power to do injustice, whenever he thinks proper. This, though a wicked purpose, is neither absurd nor unattainable.

6°. The last paragraph, relative to Lord Chatham's cause cannot be answered. It partly refers to facts, of too secret a nature to be ascertained, and partly is unintelligible. "Upon one point, the cause is decided against Lord Chatham.—Upon another point, it is decided for him."—Both the law and the language are well suited to a Barrister!—If I have any guess at this honest gentleman's meaning; it is, that, "whereas the commissioners of the Great Seal saw the question in a point of view unfationally.—"

" dingly,-Lord Mansfield, out of sheer love and kindness to Lord Chatham, took the pains to

" place it in a point of view more favourable to the

" appellant." — Credat Judæus Apella. — So curious an affertion would stagger the faith of Mr. Sylva.

LETTER LXIV.

2 November, 1771.

WE are defired to make the following declaration, in behalf of Junius, upon three material points, on which his opinion has been mistaken, or misrepresented.

1°. Junius considers the right of taxing the colonies, by an act of the British Legislature, as a speculative right merely, never to be exerted, nor ever to be renounced. To his judgment it appears plain, "That the general reasonings, which were employ-

" ed against that power, went directly to our whole

" legislative right, and that one part of it could not

"be yielded to fuch arguments, without a virtual

" furrender of all the rest."

2°. That, with regard to press-warrants, his argument should be taken in his own words, and answered strictly;—that comparisons may sometimes illustrate, but prove nothing; and that, in this case, an appeal to the passions is unfair and unnecessary. Junius feels and acknowledges the evil in the most express terms, and will shew himself ready to concur in any rational plan, that may provide for the liberty of the individual, without hazarding the safety of the community. At the same time, he expects that the evil, such as it is, be not exaggerated or mitre-presented.

presented. In general, it is not unjust that, when the rich man contributes his wealth, the poor man should ferve the state in person; -otherwise the latter contributes nothing to the defence of that law and confitution, from which he demands fafery and protection. But the question does not lye between rich and poor. The laws of England make no diffinctions. Neither is it true that the poor man is torn from the care and support of a wife and family, helpless without him. The fingle question is, whether the feaman*, in times of public danger, shall ferve the merchant or the state, in that prefession to which he was bred, and by the exercise of which alone he can honestly support himself and his family. - General arguments against the dostrine of necessity, and the dangerous use that may be made of it, are of no weight in this particular cafe. Necessity includes the idea of inevitable. Whenever it is fo, it creates a law, to which all positive laws, and all positive rights must give way. In this sense the levy of saip-money by the King's warrant was not necessary, because the business might have been as well or better done by parliament. If the doctrine, maintained by Junius, be confined within this limitation, it will go but very little way in support of arbitrary power. That the King is to judge of the occasion, is no objection, unless we are told how it can possibly be otherwise. There are other instances, not less important in the exercise, nor less dangerous in the abuse, in which the constitution relies entirely upon the King's judgment. The executive power proclaims was and peace, binds the nation by treaties, orders general embargoes, and imposes quarantines, not to mention a multitude of prerogative writs, which, though liable to the greatest abuses, were never disputed.

^{*} I confine myfelf firstly to feamen;—if any others are pressed, it is a goods abuse, which the magnitude can and should correct.

3°. It has been urged, as a reproach to Junius, that he has not delivered an opinion upon the Game Laws, and particularly the late Dog-act. But Junius thinks he has much greater reason to complain, that he is never assisted by those, who are able to affift him, and that almost the whole labour of the preis is thrown upon a fingle hand, from which a discussion of every public question whatsoever is unreasonably expected. He is not paid for his labour, and certainly has a right to choose his employment. --- As to the Game Laws, he never scrupled to declare his opinion, that they are a species of the Forest Laws, that they are oppressive to the subject, and that the spirit of them is incompatible with legal liberty: - that the penalties, imposed by these laws, bear no proportion to the nature of the offence, that the mode of trial and the degree and kind of evidence necessary to convict, not only deprive the fubject of all the benefits of a trial by jury, but are in themselves too summary, and to the last degree arbitrary and oppressive. That, in particular, the late acts to prevent dog-stealing, or killing game between fun and fun, are distinguished by their abfurdity, extravagance, and pernicious tendency. If these terms are weak, or ambiguous, in what language can Junius express himself?-It is no excuse for Lord Mansfield to say that he happened to be absent when these bills passed the house of lords. It was his duty to be present. Such bills could never have passed the house of commons without his his knowledge. But we very well know by what rule he regulates his attendance. When that order was made in the house of lords in the case of Lord Pomfret, at which every Englishman shudders, my honest Lord Mansfield sound himself, by mere accident, in the court of king's bench.—Otherwise, he would have done wonders in defence of law and property! The pitiful evasion is adapted to the character. But Junius will never justify himself, by the example of this bad man. The distinction between doing wrong, and avoiding to do right belongs to Lord Mansfield. Junius disclaims it.

LETTER LXV.

TO LORD CHIEF JUSTICE MANSFIELD.

2 November, 1771.

A T the intercession of three of your countrymen, A you have bailed a man, who, I presume, is also a Scotchman, and whom the Lord Mayor of London had refused to bail. I do not mean to enter into an examination of the partial, finister motives of your conduct; but confining myself strictly to the fact, I affirm, that you have done that, which by law you were not warranted to do. was taken in the theft;-the stolen goods were found upon him, and he made no defence. In thefe circumstances, (the truth of which You dare not deny, because it is of public notoriety) it could not stand indifferent whether he was guilty or not, much less could there be any presumption of his innocence; and, in these circumstances, I affirm, in contradiction to YOU, LORD CHIEF JUSTICE 0 2 MANS-

MANSFIELD, that, by the laws of England, he was not bailable. If ever Mr. Eyre should be brought to trial, we shall hear what You have to say for Your-felf; and I pledge myself, before God and my country, in proper time and place to make good my charge against you.

JUNIUS.

LETTER LXVI.

TO THE PRINTER OF THE PUBLIC AD-VERTISER.

JUNIUS engages to make good his charge against Lord Chief Justice Mansfield, some time before the meeting of parliament, in order that the house of commons may, if they think proper, make it one article in the impeachment of the faid Lord Chief Justice.

LETTER LXVII.

TO HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF GRAFTON.

WHAT is the reason, my Lord, that, when almost every man in the kingdom, without distinction of principles or party, exults in the ridiculous defeat of Sir James Lowther, when good and bad men unite in one common opinion of that baronet, and triumph in his distress, as if the event (without any reference to vice or virtue) were interesting to human nature, your Grace alone should appear so miserably depressed and afflicted? In such universal universal joy, I know not where you will look for a compliment of condolence, unless you appeal to the tender, fympathetic forrows of Mr. Bradshaw. That cream-coloured gentleman's tears, affecting as they are, carry confolation along with them. He never weeps, but, like an April shower, with a lambent ray of funthine upon his countenance. From the feelings of honest men, upon this joyful occasion, I do not mean to draw any conclusion to your Grace. They naturally rejoice, when they fee a fignal instance of tyranny refisted with success; -of treachery exposed to the derision of the world; -an infamous informer defeated, and an impudent robber dragged to the public gibbet .- But, in the other class of mankind, I own I expected to meet the Duke of Grafton. Men who have no regard for justice, nor any fense of honour, seem as heartily pleafed with Sir James Lowther's well deferved punishment, as if it did not constitute an example against themselves. The unhappy Baronet has no friends, even among those who resemble him. You, my Lord, are not reduced to so deplorable a state of dereliction. Every villain in the kingdom is your friend; and, in compliment to fuch amity, I think you should suffer your dismal countenance to clear up. Befides, my Lord; -I am a little anxious for the confishency of your character. You violate your own rules of decorum, when you do not infult the man, whom you have betrayed.

THE divine justice of retribution feems now to have begun its progress. Deliberate treachery entails punishment upon the traitor. There is no possibility of escaping it, even in the highest rank, to which the confent of fociety can exalt the meanest and worst of men. The forced, unnatural union of Luttrell and Middlefex was an omen of another unnatural union, by which indefeafible infamy is attached to the house of Brunswick. If one of those acts was virtuous and honourable, the best of princes, I thank God, is happily rewarded for it by the other. - Your Grace, it has been faid, had fome thare in recommending Colonel Luttrell to the King; -or was it only the gentle Bradshaw, who made himself answerable for the good behaviour of his friend? An intimate connexion has long subfifted between him and the worthy Lord Irnham. It arose from a fortunate similarity of principles, cemented by the constant mediation of their common friend Miss Davis *.

YET

There is a certain family in this country, on which nature feems to have entailed an hereditary baseness of disposition. As far as their history has been known, the son has regularly improved upon the vices of the father, and has taken care to transmit them pure and undiminished into the bosom of his successor. In the senate, their abilities have confined them to those humble, fordid services, in which the seavengers of the ministry are usually employed. But in the memoirs of private treachery, they stand first and unrivalled. The following story will serve to illustrate the character of this respectable family, and to convince the world that the present possessor has as clear a state to the infamy of his ancestors, as he has to their estate. It deserves to be recorded for the curiosity of the fact, and should be given to the public as a warning to every honest member of society.

The present Lord Imbam, who is now in the decline of life, larely cultivated the acquaintance of a younger brother of a family, with which he had lived in some degree of intimacy and friendship. The young man had long been the dupe of a most unhappy attachment to a common prostitute. His friends and relations foresaw the consequences of this connexion, and did every thing that depended upon them to save him from ruin. But he had a friend in Lord Imham.

YET I confess I should be sorry that the opprobrious infamy of this match should reach beyond the family.—We have now a better reason than ever to pray for the long life of the best of princes, and the welfare of his royal iffue.—I will not mix any thing ominous with my prayers;—but let parliament look to it.—A Luttrell shall never succeed to the crown of England.—If the hereditary virtues of the family deserve a kingdom, Scotland will be a proper retreat for them.

THE next is a most remarkable instance of the goodness of Providence. The just law of retaliation has at last overtaken the little, contemptible tyrant of the North. To this son-in-law of your dearest friend the Earl of Bute, you meant to transfer the Duke of Portland's property; and you hastened the grant, with an expedition unknown to the Treasury, that he might have it time enough to give a decisive turn to the election of the county. The immediate consequence of this slagitious robbery was, that he lost the election, which you meant to ensure to him, and with such signal circumstances of scorn, reproach, and insult, (to say nothing of the general exultation of all parties) as, (excepting the King's whose advice rendered all their endeavours ineffectual. This hoary letcher, not contented with the enjoyment of his friend's mistress, was base enough to take advantage of the passions and folly of a young man, and persuaded him to marry her. He descended even to perform the office of father to the prositiute. He gave her to his friend, who was on the point of leaving the kingdom, and the next night lay with her himself.

Whether the depravity of the human heart can produce any thing more base and detestable than this fact, must be lest undetermined, until the son shall arrive at his father's age and experience.

brother-in-law Col. Luttrell, and old Simon his father-in-law) hardly ever fell upon a gentleman in this country.—In the event, he loses the very property, of which he thought he had gotten possession; and after an expense, which would have paid the value of the land in question twenty times over.—The forms of villainy, you see, are necessary to its success. Hereaster you will act with greater circumspection, and not drive so directly to your object. To snatch a grace beyond the reach of common treachery; is an exception, not a rule,

AND now, my good Lord, does not your conscious heart inform you, that the justice of retribution begins to operate, and that it may soon approach your person?—Do you think that Junius has renounced the Middlesex election?—Or that the King's timber shall be resused to the Royal Navy with impunity?—Or that you shall hear no more of the sale of that patent to Mr. Hing, which you endeavoured to skreen by suddenly dropping your prosecution of Samuel Vaughan, when the rule against him was made absolute? I believe indeed there never was such an instance in all the history of negative impudence.—But it shall not save you. The very sunshine you live in is a presude to your dissolution. When you are ripe, you shall be plucked.

JUNIUS.

P. S. I beg you will convey to our gracious mafter my humble congratulations upon the glorious fuccess of peerages and pensions, so lavishing distributed as the rewards of Irish virtue.

LETTER LXVIII.

TO LORD CHIEF JUSTICE MANSFIELD.

21 Fanuary, 1772. I HAVE undertaken to prove that when, at the intercession of three of your countrymen, you bailed John Eyre, you did that, which by law you were not warranted to do, and that a felon, under the circumstances, of being taken in the fael, with the floten goods upon him, and making no defence, is not bailable by the laws of England. Your learned advocates have interpreted this charge into a denial that the court of King's Bench, or the judges of that court during the vacation, have any greater authority to bail for criminal offences, than a justice of peace. With the instance before me, I am suppefed to question your power of doing wrong, and to deny the existence of a power, at the same moment that I arraign the illegal exercise of it. But the opimons of fuch men, whether wilful in their malignity, or fincere in their ignorance, are unworthy of my notice. You, Lord Mansfield, did not understand me so, and, I promise you, your cause requires an abler defence.- I am now to make good my charge against you. However dull my argument, the subject of it is interesting. I shall be honoured with the attention of the public, and have a right to demand the attention of the legislature. Supported, as I am, by the whole body of the criminal law of England, I have no doubt of establishing my charge. If, on your part, you should have no plain, substantial defence, but should endeavour deavour to shelter yourself under the quirk and evafion of a practifing lawyer, or under the mere, infulting affertion of power without right, the reputation you pretend to is gone for ever ;-you fland degraded from the respect and authority of your office, and are no longer, de jure, Lord Chief Justice of England. This letter, my Lord, is addreffed, not so much to you, as to the public. Learned as you are, and quick in apprehension. few arguments are necessary to satisfy you, that you have done that, which by law you were not warranted to do. Your conscience already tells you, that you have finned against knowledge, and that whatever defence you make contradicts your own internal conviction. But other men are willing enough to take the law upon trust. They rely upon your authority, because they are too indolent to fearch for information; or, conceiving that there is fome mystery in the laws of their country, which lawyers are only qualified to explain, they diffruit their judgment, and voluntarily renounce the right of thinking for themselves. With all the evidence of history before them, from Trefillian to Jefferies, from Jefferies to Mansfield, they will not believe it possible that a learned judge can act in direct contradiction to those laws, which he is supposed to have made the study of his life, and which he has fworn to administer faithfully. Superstition is certainly not the characteristic of this age. Yet fome men are bigoted in politics, who are infidels in religion. - I do not despair of making them ashamed of their credulity.

THE

THE charge I brought against you is expressed in terms guarded and well considered. They do not deny the strict power of the judges of the court of King's Bench to bail in cases, not bailable by a justice of peace, nor replevisable by the common writ, or ex officio by the Sherist. I well knew the practice of the court, and by what legal rules it ought to be directed. But far from meaning to soften or diminish the force of those terms I have made use of, I now go beyond them, and affirm,

I. THAT the superior power of bailing for selony, claimed by the court of King's Bench, is sounded upon the opinion of lawyers, and the practice of the court;—that the affent of the legislature to this power is merely negative, and that it is not supported by any positive provision in any statute whatfoever .- If it be, produce the statute.

II. ADMITTING that the judges of the court of King's Bench are vefted with a difcretionary power to examine and judge of circumstances and allegations, which a justice of peace is not permitted to confider, I affirm that the judges, in the use and application of that discretionary power, are as frictly bound by the spirit, intent, and meaning, as the justice of peace is by the words of the legiflature. Favourable circumstances, alledged before the judge, may justify a doubt whether the prisoner be guilty or not; and where the guilt is doubtful, a prefumption of innocence should, in general, be admitted. But, when any fuch probable circumflances are alledged, they alter the state and condition of the prisoner. He is no longer that all-but-convicted felon, whom the law intends, and who by law is not bailable at all. If no circumstances whatfoever are alledged in his favour ;-if no allegation what foever be made to leffen the force of that evidence, which the law arnexes to a positive charge of felony, and particulastly to the fact of being taken with the maner, I then say that the Lord Chief Justice of England has no more right to bail him than a juffice of peace. The discretion of an English judge is not of mere will and pleasure; -it is not arbitrary; -it is not capricious; but as that great lawyer, (whole authority I wish you respected half as much as I do) truly fays*, " Diferetion taken as it ought to " be, is, discernere per legem quid sit justum. If it be not directed by the right line of the law, it " is a crooked cord, and appeareth to be unlaw-" ful."-If discretion were arbitrary in the judge, he might introduce what novelties he thought proper; but, fays Lord Coke, "Novelties, without " warrant of precedents, are not to be allowed; " fome certain rules are to be followed; - Quieco quid judicis authoritati subjicitur, novitati non " fubjicitur;" and this found doctrine is applied to the Star-chamber, a court confessedly arbitrary. If you will abide by the authority of this great man, you shall have all the advantage of his opinon, wherever it appears to favour you. Excepting the plair, express meaning of the legislature, to which all private opinions must give way, I defire no better judge between us than Lord Coke.

III. I AFFIRM that, according to the obvious, indiffutable meaning of the legislature, repeatedly expressed, a person positively charged with felonioully flealing and taken in flagrante delisto, with the Rolen goods upon him, is not bailable. The law confiders him as differing in nothing from a convict, but in the form of conviction, and (whatever a corrupt judge may do) will accept of no fecurity, but the confinement of his body within four walls. I know it has been alledged in your favour, that you have often bailed for murders, rapes, and other manifest crimes. Without questioning the fact, I shall not admit that you are to be justified by your own example. If that were a protection to you. where is the crime that, as a judge, you might not now securely commit? But neither shall I suffer myfelf to be drawn afide from my prefent argument, nor you to profit by your own wrong. - To prove the meaning and intent of the legislature will require a minute and tedious deduction. To invefligate a question of law demands forme labour and attention, though very little genius or fagacity. As a practical profession, the study of the law requires but a moderate portion of abilities. The learning of a pleader is usually upon a level with his integrity. The indifcriminate defence of right and wrong contracts the understanding, while it corrupts the heart. Subtlety is foon mistaken for wildom, and impunity for virtue. If there be any inflances upon record, as fome there are undoubtedly, of genius and morality united in a lawyer, they are diffinguished by their fingularity, and operate as exceptions.

I must folicit the patience of my readers. This is no light matter, nor is it any more susceptible of ornament ornament, than the conduct of Lord Mansfield is capable of aggravation.

As the law of bail, in charges of felony, has been exactly ascertained by acts of the legislature, it is at prefent of little consequence to enquire how it stood at common law, before the statute of Westminster. And yet it is worth the reader's attention to observe, how nearly, in the ideas of our ancestors, the circumstance of being taken with the maner approached to the conviction of the felon *. It " fixed the authoritative stamp of verisimilitude " upon the accufation, and, by the common law, " when a thief was taken with the maner (that is, " with the thing stolen upon him, in manu) he " might, so detected flagrante delicto, be brought into court, arraigned and tried, without indid-" ment; as, by the Danish law, he might be taken and hanged upon the fpot, without accusa-"tion or trial." It will foon appear that our flatute law, in this behalf, though lefs fummary in point of proceeding, is directed by the same spirit. In one inflance, the very form is adhered to. In offences relating to the forest, if a man was taken with vert, or venison +, it was declared to be equivalent to indictment. To enable the reader to judge for himself, I shall state, in due order, the feveral flatutes relative to bail in criminal cales, or as much of them as may be material to the point in question, omitting superfluous words. If I missepresent, or do not quote with fidelity, it will not be difficult to detect me.

^{*} Blackstone, 4. 303.

^{+ 1} Ed. III. cap. 8 .--- and 7 Rich. II. cap. 4.

* THE flatute of Westminster the first, in 1275, fets forth that, " Forasmuch as Sheriffs and others, " who have taken and kept in prison persons de-" tected of felony, and incontinent have let out by " replevin fuch as were not replevifable, because they " would gain of the one party and grieve the other; " and, forafmuch as, before this time, it was not "determined which perfons were replevifable and " which not, it is provided and by the King com-" manded that fuch prisoners, &c. as be taken with the maner, &c. or for manifest offences, shall be " in no wife replevifable by the common writ, nor " without writ." +-Lord Coke, in his exposition of the last part of this quotation, accurately diftinguishes between replevy by the common writ or ex officio, and bail by the King's Bench. words of the statute certainly do not extend to the judges of that court. But, besides that the reader will foon find reason to think that the legislature, in their intention, made no difference between bailable and replevisable, Lord Coke himself (if he be understood to mean nothing but an exposition of the statute of Westminister, and not to state the law generally) does not adhere to his own diffinction. In expounding the other offences, which, by this ^{• &}quot; l'idetur que le statute de mainprise nest que rehersall del comen ley".

Bro. Mainp. 61.

^{4 &}quot; There are three points to be considered in the construction of all remedial statutes;—the old law, the mischies, and the reme-

[&]quot; dy ;-that is, how the common law flood at the making of the act,

[&]quot; what the mischief was for which the common law did n t provide, " and what remedy the parliament hath provided to one this mis-

[&]quot;chief. It is the business of he judges, so to construe the act, as to

[&]quot; suppress the mischief and advance the remedy."

flatute, are declared not replevisable, he constantly uses the words not bailable .- " That outlaws, for " instance, are not bailable at all; that perfons, " who have abjured the realm, are attainted upon "their own confession, and therefore not bailable at " all by law; -that provers are not bailable; -that " notorious felons are not bailable." The reason, why the superior courts were not named in the statute of Westminster, was plainly this, " because " antiently most of the business, touching bailment " of prisoners for felony or misdemeanors, was perof formed by the Sheriffs, or special bailiffs of liber-" ties, either by writ, or virtute officii*;" confequently the superior courts had little or no opportunity to commit those abuses, which the statute imputes to the Sheriffs .- With submission to Doctor Blackstone, I think he has fallen into a contradiction, which, in terms at least, appears irreconcileable. After enumerating feveral offences not bailable, he afferts, without any condition or limitation whatfoever+, " all thefe are clearly not admissible to " bail." Yet in a few lines after he fays, " it is " agreed that the court of King's Bench may bail " for any crime whatfoever, according to circumflance ces of the case." To his first proposition he should have added, by Sheriffs or Justices; otherwise the two propositions contradict each other; with this difference however, that the first is absolute, the fecond limited by a confideration of circumstances. I fay this without the least intended difrespect to the learned author. His work is of public utility, and should not hastily be condemned.

^{* 2} Hale, P. C. 128. 136.

⁺ Blackstone, 4. 296.

THE statute of 17 Richard II. cap. 10. 1393, sets forth, that "forasmuch as thieves notoriously de"famed, and others taken with the maner, by their "long abiding in prison, were delivered by charters, and favourable inquests produced, to the great
"hindrance of the people, two men of law shall be assigned, in every commission of the peace, to proceed to the deliverance of such selons, &c."
It seems by this act, that there was a constant struggle between the legislature and the officers of justice.
Not daring to admit selons taken with the maner to bail or mainprize, they evaded the law by keeping the party in prison a long time, and then delivering him without due trial.

The statute of 1 Richard III. in 1483, sets forth, that "forasmuch as divers persons have been daily "arrested and imprisoned for suspicion of selony, "formetime of malice, and sometime of a light suspicion, and so kept in prison without bail or mainprize, be it ordained that every justice of peace "thall have authority, by his discretion, to let such "pritoners and persons so arrested to bail or mainprize."—By this act "t appears that there had been abuses in matter of imprisonment, and that the legislature meant to provide for the immediate enlargement of persons arrested on light suspicion of second.

THE statute of 3 Henry VII. in 1486, declares, that "under colour of the preceding act of Richard the Third, persons, fuch as were not mainpernable, were oftentimes let to bail or mainprize, by justices. P

"tices of the peace, whereby many murderers and "felons escaped, the King, &c. hath ordained, that

" the justices of the peace, or two of them at least

" (whereof one to be of the quorum) have authority

" to let any such prisoners or persons, mainpernable

"by the law, to bail or mainprize."

THE statute of 1st and 2d of Philip and Mary, in 1554, fets forth, that " notwithstanding the pre-" ceding statute of Henry the Seventh, one justice of peace hath oftentimes, by finister labour and " means, fet at large the greatest and notablest offenders, fuch as be not replevifable by the laws of this 46 realm, and yet, the rather to hide their affections " in that behalf, have figned the cause of their ap-" prehension to be but only for suspicion of felony, " whereby the faid offenders have escaped unpu-" nished, and do daily, to the high displeasure of " Almighty God, the great peril of the King and " Queen's true subjects, and encouragement of all " thieves and evil-doers; - for reformation where-" of be it enacted, that no justices of peace shall let et to bail or mainprize any fuch perfons, which, for any offence by them committed, be declared not " to be replevifed, or bailed, or be forbidden to be replevised or bailed by the flatute of Westminster " the first; and furthermore that any persons, ar-" rested for manslaughter, felony, being bailable by " the law, shall not be let to bail or mainprize, by " any justices of peace, but in the form therein after " prescribed."-In the two preceding statutes, the words bailable, replevifable, and mainpernable are used synonymously *, or promiscuously to express the fame fingle intention of the legislature, viz. not to accept of any security but the body of the offender; and when the latter statute prescribes the form, in which perfons arrested on suspicion of felony (being bailable by the law) may be let to bail, it evidently supposes that there are some cases, not bailable by the law .- It may be thought perhaps, that I attribute to the legislature an appearance of inaccuracy in the use of terms, merely to serve my present purpose. But, in truth, it would make more forcibly for my argument to prefume that the legislature were conflantly aware of the first legal diffinction between bail and repleur, and that they always meant to adhere to it . For if it be true that replexy is by the Sheriffs, and bail by the higher courts at Westminfter, (which I think no lawyer will deny) it follows that, when the legislature expressly say, that any particular offence is by law not bailable, the fuperior courts are comprehended in the prohibition, and bound by it. Otherwise, unless there was a positive exception of the superior courts (which I affirm there never was in any flatute relative to bail) the legislature would grossly contradict themselves, and the manifest intention of the law be evaded. is an established rule that, when the law is special, and reason of it general, it is to be generally underflood; and though, by custom, a latitude be allowed to the court of King's Bench, (to confider circumstances inductive of a doubt whether the prisoner be guilty or innocent) if this latitude be taken as an arbitrary power to bail, when no circumstances whatsoever are alledged in favour of the prisoner, it is a power without right, and a daring violation of the whole English law of bail.

^{* 2} Hale, P. C: 2. 124.

^{*} Vide 2 Inst. 150. 186.—" The word replevisable never signifies "bailable. Bailable is in a court of record by the King's justices; but replevisable is by the Sheriff."

THE act of the 31st of Charles the Second (commonly called the Habeas Corpus all) particularly declares, that it is not meant to extend to treason or felony plainly and specially expressed in the warrant of commitment. The prisoner is therefore left to feek his Habeas Corpus at common law; and fo far was the legislature from supposing that perfons, (committed for treason or felony plainly and specially expressed in the warrant of commitment) could be let to bail by a fingle judge, or by the whole court, that this very act provides a remedy for such perfons, in case they are not indicted in the course of the term or fessions subsequent to their commitment. The law neither fuffers them to be enlarged before trial, nor to be imprisoned after the time, in which they ought regularly to be tried. In this case the law fays, "It shall and may be lawful to and for "the judges of the court of King's Bench and juf-"tices of over and terminer, or general goal deliveer ry, and they are hereby required, upon motion " to them made in open court, the last day of the " term, fession, or goal delivery, either by the pri-" foner or any one in his behalf, to fet at liberty the " prisoner upon bail; unless it appear to the judges and justices, upon oath made, that the witnesses " for the King could not be produced the fame "term, fessions, or goal delivery,"-Upon the whole of this article I observe, I. That the provifion, made in the first part of it, would be, in a great mealure.

measure, useless and nugatory, if any single judge might have bailed the prisoner ex arbitrio, during the vacation; or if the court might have bailed him immediately after the commencement of the term or festions .--- 2. When the law says, It shall and may be lawful to bail for felony under particular circumstances, we must presume that, before the pasfing of that act, it was not lawful to bail under those circumstances. The terms used by the legislature are enacting, not declaratory .- 3. Notwithstanding the party may have been imprisoned during the greatest part of the vacation, and during the whole festion, the court are expressly forbidden to bail him from that fession to the next, if oath be made that the witnesses for the King could not be produced that fame term or fessions.

HAVING faithfully stated the several acts of parliament relative to bail in criminal cases, it may be useful to the reader to take a short, historical review of the law of bail, through its various gradations and amprovements.

By the ancient common law, before and fince the conquest, all selonies were bailable, till murder was excepted by statute, so that persons might be admitted to bail, before conviction, almost in every case. The statute of Westminster says that, before that time, it had not been determined, which offences were replevisable, and which were not, whether by the common writ de homine replegiando, or ex officio by the Sherist. It is very remarkable that the abuses arising from this unlimited power of replevy, dreadful as they were and destructive to the peace of society, were not corrected or taken notice of by the legislature, until the commons of the kingdom had obtained a share in it by their representatives; but the house of commons had scarce begun to exist, when these formidable abuses were corrected by the statute of Westminster. It is highly probable that the mischief had been severely felt by the people, although no remedy had been provided for it by the Norman Kings or Barons, The iniquity of the times was fo great, as it even forced the subjects to forego that, which was in account a great liberty, to stop the course of a growing mischief." The preamble to the statutes, made by the first parliament of Edward the first, assigns the reason of calling it, + " because the people had been otherwise en-" treated than they ought to be, the peace less kept, the laws less used, and offenders less punis ised than they ought to be, by reason whereof the people feared less to offend;" and the first attempt to reform these various abuses was by contracting the power of replevying felons.

For above two centuries following it does not appear that any alteration was made in the law of bail, except that being taken with vert or venifon was declared to be equivalent to indictment. The legislature adhered firmly to the spirit of the statute of Westminster. The statute of 27th of Edward the First directs the justices of assize to enquire and punish officers bailing such as were not bailable. As for the judges of the superior courts, it is probable that, in those days, they thought themselves bound by the obvious intent and meaning of the legislature. They considered not so much to what particular persons the prohibition was addressed, as what the thing was, which the legislature meant to prohibit, well knowing that in law, quando aliquid prohibetur, prohibetur et omne, per quod devenitur ad illud. "When any thing is forbidden, all means, by which the same thing may be compassed or

Selden, by N. Bacon. 182.

⁴ Parliamentary Hittory. 1. 82.

" done, are equally forbidden."

By the statute of Richard the Third, the power of bailing was a little enlarged. Every justice of peace was authorifed to bail for felony; but they were expressly confined to persons arrested on light fuspicion; and even this power, so limited, was found to produce such inconveniencies that, in three years after, the legislature found it necessary to repeal it. Instead of trusting any longer to a fingle justice of peace, the act of 3d Henry VIIth, repeals the preceding act, and directs "that no " prisoner, (of those who are mainternable by the " law) shall be let to bail or mainprife, by less " than two justices, whereof one to be of the quo-" rum." And so indispensably necessary was this provision thought, for the administration of justice. and for the security and peace of society, that, at this time, an oath was proposed by the King to be taken by the knights and efquires of his household, by the members of the house of commons, and by the peers spiritual and temporal, and accepted and fworn to quali una voce by them all, which, among other engagements, binds them " not to let any " man to bail or mainprife, knowing and deeming is him to be a felon, upon your honour and wor" ship. So help you God and all Saints. ""

In about half a century however even these provisions were found intusticient. The act of Henry the Seventh was evaded, and the legislature once more obliged to interpose. The act of 1st and 2d of Philip and Mary takes away intirely from the justices all power of bailing for offences declared not bailable by the statute of Westminster.

THE illegal imprisonment of several persons, who had refuted to contribute to a loan exacted by Charles the first, and the delay of the Habeas Corpus and subsequent refusal to bail them, constituted one of the first and most important grievances of that reign. Yet when the house of commons, which met in the year 1628, resolved upon meafores of the most firm and strenuous resistance to the power of imprisonment affumed by the King or privy-council, and to the refufal to bail the party on the return of the Habeas Corpus, they did expressly, in all their resolutions, make an exception of commitments, where the cause of the restrains was expressed, and did by law justify the commentment. The reason of the distinction is, that, whereas when the cause of commitment is expressed, the crime is then known, and the offender must be brought to the ordinary trial; if, on the contrary, no cause of commitment be expressed, and the prisoner be thereupon remanded, it may operate to perpetual impriforment. This contest with Charles the first produced the act of the 16th of that King, by which the court of King's Bench are directed, within three days after the return of the Habeas Corpus to examine and determine the legality of any commitment by the King or privy-council, and to do what to justice shall appertain in delivering, bailing, or remanding the prisoner.—Now, it seems, it is unnecessary for the judge to do what appertains to justice. The same scandalous traffic, in which we have seen the privilege of parliament exerted or relaxed, to gratify the present humour, or to serve the immediate purpose of the crown, is introduced into the administration of justice. The magistrate, it seems, has now no rule to follow, but the dictates of personal enmity, national partiality, or perhaps the most prostituted corruption.

^{*} Parliamentary History. 2. 419-

To compleat this historical inquiry, it only remains to be observed that, the Habeas Gorpus act of 31st of Charles the second, so justly considered as another Magna Charta of the kingdom * " extends only to the case of commitments for such " criminal charge, as can produce no inconvenience to public justice by a temporary enlargement of the pritoner."-So careful were the legiflature, at the very moment, when they were providing for the liberty of the fubject, not to furnish any colour or pretence for violating or evading the established law of bail in the higher criminal offences. But the exception, stated in the body of the act, puts the matter out of all doubt. After directing the judges how they are to proceed to the discharge of the prisoner upon recognisance and furety, having regard to the quality of the prisoner and nature of the offence, it is expressly added. " unless it shall appear to the said Lord Chancelfor, &c. that the party, so committed, is de-" tained for such matters, or offences, for the Blackstone, 4. 137.

es which.

" which, BY THE LAW THE PRISONER IS NOT BAILABLE."

When the laws, plain of themselves, are thus illustrated by facts, and their uniform meaning established by history, we do not want the authority of opinions however respectable, to inform our judgment or to confirm our belief. But I am determined that you shall have no escape. Authority of every sort shall be produced against you, from Jacob to Lord Coke, from the dictionary to the classic.—In vain shall you appeal from those upright judges, whom you disdain to imitate, to those whom you have made your example. With one voice, they all condemn you.

"To be taken with the maner is where a thief,

" having stolen any thing, is taken with the same about him, as it were in his hands, which is se called flagrante delicto. Such a criminal is not

" bailable by law." - Jacob under the word Maner.
"THOSE, who are taken with the Maner, are

" excluded, by the statute of Westminster, from the benefit of a replevin."—Hawkins. P. C. 2.

98.

"Or fuch heinous offences no one, who is notoriously guilty, seems to be bailable by the in-

" tent of this statute."-Do. 2. 99.

"THE common practice, and allowed general rule is, that bail is only then proper where it

" stands indifferent whether the party were guilty

" or innocent."-Do. Do.

"THERE is no doubt but that the bailing of a person, who is not bailable by law, is punisha" ble, either at common law as a negligent escape, or as an offence against the several statutes re-" lative to bail."-Do. 89.

" Ir cannot be doubted but that, neither the " judges of this, nor of any other superior court of justice, are strictly within the purview of that statute, yet they will always, in their dif-" cretion, pay a due regard to it, and not admit " a person to bail, who is expressly declared by it " irreplevisable, without some particular circum-" flance in his favour; and therefore it feems dif-" ficult to find an instance, where persons, attreat tainted of felony, or notoriously guilty of treaof fon or manslaughter, &c. by their own confes-" fion, or otherwise, have been admitted to the benefit of bail, without some special metive to " the court to grant it."-Do. 114.

" Ir it appears that any man hath injury or " wrong by his imprisonment, we have power to " deliver and discharge him ;-if otherwise, he is " remanded by us to prison again." - Lord Ghief Y. State Trials. 7. 115.

" THE statute of Westminster was especially " for direction to the Sheriffs and others, but to " fay courts of justice are excluded from this sta-"tute, I conceive it cannot be."-Attorney General Heath. Do. 132.

"THE court, upon view of the return, judg-" eth of the fufficiency or infufficiency of it. If " they think the prisoner in law to be bailable, he is committed to the Marshal and bailed; if not, " he is remanded."-Through the whole debate the objection, on the part of the prisoners, was, that no cause of commitment was expressed in the warrant;

warrant; but it was uniformly admitted by their council that, if the commitment had been expresfed for treason or felony, the court would then have done right in remanding them.

THE Attorney General having urged, before a committee of both houses, that, in Beckwith's case and others, the lords of the council sent a letter to the court of King's Bench to bail; it was replied by the managers of the house of commons, that this was of no moment, " for that either the or prisoner was bailable by the law, or not bailable; "-if bailable by the law, then he was to be " bailed without any fuch letter :- if not bailable "by the law, then plainly the judges could not 's have bailed him upon the letter, without breach of their oath, which is, that they are to do juf-" tice according to the law, &c." - State Trials. 7. 175.

" So that, in bailing upon fuch offences of the " highest nature, a kind of discretion, rather than " a constant law, hath been exercised, when it " flands wholly indifferent in the eye of the court, " whether the prisoner be guilty or not." - Selden.

St. Tr. 7. 230. 1.

"I DENY that a man is always bailable, when " imprisonment is imposed upon him for custody." Attorney General Heath. Do. 238 .- By these quotations from the State Trials, though otherwise not of authority, it appears plainly that, in regard to bailable or not bailable, all parties agreed in admitting one proposition as incontrovertible.

66 In relation to capital offences there are especi-" ally there acts of parliament that are the common ce landmarks " landmarks * touching offences bailable or not bail" able." Hale. 2. P. C. 127. The enumeration includes the feveral acts cited in this paper.

"PERSONS, taken with the Manouvre, are not bailable, because it is furtum manifestum." Hale.

2. P. C. 133.

"The writ of Habeas Corpus is of a high nature; for if persons be wrongfully committed, they are to be discharged upon this writ returned; or, if bailable, they are to be bailed;—if not bailable, they are to be committed." Hale. 2. P. G. 143: This doctrine of Lord Chief Justice Hale refers immediately to the superior courts from whence the writ issues.——"After the return is filed, the court is either to discharge, or bail, or commit him, as the nature of the case requires." Hale. 2. P. C. 146.

"Is bail be granted, otherwise than the law al"loweth, the party that alloweth the same, shall be "fined, imprisoned, render damages, or forfeit his
"place, as the case shall require." Selden by N.
Bacon. 182.

"THIS induces an absolute necessity of expression, upon every commitment, the reason, for which it is made; that the court, upon a Habeas "Corpus, may examine into its validity, and, ae- cording to the circumstances of the case, may discharge, admit to bail, or remand the prisoner." Blackstone. 3. 133.

"MARRIOT was committed for forging indorfe"ments upon bank bills, and, upon a Habeas Cor"fus, was bailed, because the crime was only a

* It has been the study of Lord Mansfield to remove landmarks.

" great mildemeanor; - for though the forging the

" bills be felony, yet forging the indorfement i

" not." Salkeld. 1. 104.

" APPELL de Mahem, &c. ideo ne fuit leffe :

" baille, nient plus que in appell de robbery on

" murder; quod nota, et que in robry et murder le

" partie n'est baillable." Bro. Mainprise. 67.

"THE intendment of the law in bails is, quod flat

" indifferenter whether he be guilty or no; but,

" when he is convict by verdict or confession, then

" he must be deemed in law to be guilty of the telony, and therefore not bailable at all." Coke. 2. Inft. 188.—4. 178.

"BAIL is quando flat indifferenter, and not when the offence is open and manifest." 2. Inft. 189

"In this case non stat indifferenter whether he be guilty or no, being taken with the Maner, that is, with the thing stolen, as it were in his hand."

Do. Do.

"IF it appeareth that this imprisonment be just and lawful, he shall be remanded to the former

"goaler; but, if it shall appear to the court that "he was imprisoned against the law of the land, they ought, by force of this statute, to deliver

" him; if it be doubtful, and under confideration, he

" may be bailed." 2. Inft. 55.

It is unnecessary to load the reader with any farther quotations. If these authorities are not deemed sufficient to establish the doctrine maintained in this paper, it will be in vain to appeal to the evidence of law-books, or to the opinions of judges. They are not the authorities, by which Lord Mansfield will abide. He assumes an arbitrary power of doing right; right; and, if he does wrong, it lies only between God and his conscience.

Now, my Lord, although I have great faith in the preceding argument, I will not fay, that every minute part of it is absolutely invulnerable. I am too well acquainted with the practice of a certain court. directed by your example, as it is governed by your authority, to think there ever yet was an argument. however conformable to law and reason, in which a cunning, quibbling attorney might not discover a flaw. But, taking the whole of it together, I affirm that it constitutes a mass of demonstration, than which nothing more compleat or fatisfactory can be offered to the human mind. How an evalive, indirect reply will stand with your reputation, or how far it will answer in point of defence at the bar of the house of lords, is worth your consideration. If, after all that has been faid, it should still be maintained, that the court of King's Bench, in bailing felons, are exempted from all legal rules whatfoever, and that the judge has no direction to purfue, but his private affections, or mere unquestionable will and pleasure, it will follow plainly, that the distinction between bailable and not bailable, uniformly expressed by the legislature, current through all our law-books, and admitted by all our great lawyers without exception, is in one fense a nugatory, in another a permicious distinction. It is nugatory, as it supposes a difference in the bailable quality of offences, when, in effect, the distinction refers only to the rank of the magistrate. It is pernicious, as it implies a rule of law, which yet the judge judge is not bound to pay the least regard to, and impresses an idea upon the minds of the people, that the judge is wifer and greater than the law.

IT remains only to apply the law, thus flated, to the fact in question. By an authentic copy of the mittimus it appears that John Eyre was committed for felony, plainly and specially expressed in the warrant of commitment. He was charged before Alderman Halifax by the oath of Thomas Fielding, William Holder, William Payne, and William Nash, for feloniously stealing eleven quires of writing-paper, value fix shillings, the property of Thomas Beach, &c .- by the examinations, upon oath, of the four perfons mentioned in the mittimus, it was proved, that large quantities of paper had been miffed, and that eleven quires (previously marked from a suspicion that Eyre was the thief) were found upon him. Many other quires of paper, marked in the fame manner, were found at his lodgings; and after he had been fometime in Wood-street Compter, a key was found in his room there, which appeared to be a key to the closet at Guildhall, from whence the paper was stolen. When asked what he had to say in his defence, his only answer was, I hope you will bail me. Mr. Holder, the Clerk, replied, That is impossible. There never was an instance of it, when the stolen goods were found upon the thief. The Lord Mayor was then applied to, and refused to ball him.—Of all these circumstances it was your duty to have informed yourfelf minutely. The fact was remarkable, and the chief magistrate of the city of London was known to have refused to bail the offender fender. To justify your compliance with the folicitations of your three countrymen, it should be proved that fuch allegations were offered to you, in behalf of their affociate, as honeftly and bona fide reduced it to a matter of doubt and indifference whether the prisoner was innocent or guilty. - Was any thing offered by the Scotch triumvirate that tended to invalidate the politive charge made against him by four credible witnesses upon oath? - Was it even infinuated to you, either by himfelf or his bail, that no felony was committed ;-or that he was not the felon; - that the Rolen goods were not found upon him; -- or that he was only the receiver, not knowing them to be stolen? - Or, in short, did they attempt to produce any evidence of his infanity?-To all these questions, I answer for you, without the least fear of contradiction, positively NO. From the moment he was arrested, he never entertained any hope of acquittal; therefore thought of nothing but obtaining bail, that he might have time to fettle his affairs, convey his fortune into another country. and spend the remainder of his life in comfort and affluence abroad. In this prudential scheme of suture happiness, the Lord Chief Justice of England most readily and heartily concurred. At fight of so much virtue in distress, your natural benevolence took the alarm. Such a man as Mr. Eyre, flruggling with adverfity, must always be an interesting scene to Lord Mansfield -Or was it that liberal anxiety, by which your whole life has been diftinguished, to enlarge the liberty of the subject?-My Lord, we did not want this new instance of the li-VOL. II. berality berality of your principles. We already knew what kind of fubjects they were, for whose liberty you were anxious. At all events, the public are much indebted to you for fixing a price, at which felony may be committed with impunity. You bound a felon, notoriously worth thirty thousand pounds, in the fum of three hundred. With your natural turn to equity, and knowing, as you are, in the doctrine of precedents, you undoubtedly meant to fettle the proportion between the fortune of the felon, and the fine, by which he may compound for his felony. The ratio now upon record, and transmitted to posterity under the auspices of Lord Mansfield, is exactly one to a hundred.-My Lord, without intending it, you have laid a cruel restraint upon the genius of your countrymen. In the warmest indulgence of their passions, they have an eye to the expence, and if their other virtues fail us, we have a resource in their æconomy.

By taking so trising a security from John Eyre, you invited and manifestly exhorted him to escape. Although in bailable cases, it be usual to take four securities, you left him in the custody of three Scotchmen, whom he might have easily satisfied for conniving at his retreat. That he did not make use of the opportunity you industriously gave him neither justifies your conduct, nor can it be any way accounted for, but by his excessive and monstrous avarice. Any other man, but this bosom-friend of three Scotchmen, would gladly have sacrificed a few hundred pounds, rather than to submit to the insamy of pleading guilty in open court. It is possible

fible indeed that he might have flattered himfelf, and not unreasonably, with the hopes of a pardon. That he would have been pardoned feems more than probable, if I had not directed the public attention to the leading step you took in favour of him. In the prefent gentle reign, we well know what use has been made of the lenity of the court and of the mercy of the crown. The Lord Chief Justice of England accepts of the hundredth part of the property of a felon taken in the fact, as a recognizance for his appearance. Your brother Smythe brow-beats a jury, and forces them to alter their verdict, by which they had found a Scotch ferieant guilty of murder; and though the Kennedies were convicted of a most deliberate and atrocious murder. they still had a claim to the royal mercy.-They were faved by the chastity of their connexions .-They had a fifter ; - yet it was not her beauty, but the pliancy of her virtue that recommended her to the King .- The holy author of our religion was feen in the company of finners; but it was his gracious purpose to convert them from their fins. Another man, who in the ceremonies of our faith might give lessons to the great enemy of it, upon different principles keeps much the same company. He advertises for patients, collects all the difeases of the heart, and turns a royal palace into an hofpital for incurables. - A man of honour has no ticket of admission at St. James's. They receive him, like a virgin at the Magdalen's; -Go thou and do likewife.

My charge against you is now made good. I shall however be ready to answer or to submit to fair objections. If, whenever this matter shall be agitated, you suffer the doors of the house of lords to be shut, I now protest, that I shall consider you as having made no reply. From that moment, in the opinion of the world, you will stand felf-convicted. Whether your reply be quibbling and evafive, or liberal and in point, will be matter for the judgment of your peers; -but if, when every possible idea of difrespect to that noble house, (in whose honour and justice the nation implicitly confides) is here most solemnly disclaimed, you should endeayour to represent this charge, as a contempt of their authority, and move their lordships to censure the publisher of this paper, I then affirm that you support injuffice by violence, that you are guilty of a heinous aggravation of your offence, and that you contribute your utmost influence to promote, on the part of the highest court of judicature, a positive denial of justice to the nation

JUNIUS.

LETTER LXIX

TO THE RIGHT HON, LORD CAMDEN.

MY LORD,

TURN with pleasure, from that barren waste, I in which no falutary plant takes root, no verdure quickens, to a character fertile, as I willingly believe, in every great and good qualification. I call upon you, in the name of the English nation, to stand forth in defence of the laws of your country, and to exert, in the cause of truth and justice, those great abilities, with which you were entrufted for the benefit of mankind. To ascertain the facts, set forth in the preceding paper, it may be necessary to call the persons, mentioned in the mittimus, to the bar of the house of lords. If a motion for that purpose should be rejected, we shall know what to think of Lord Mansfield's innocence. The legal argument is submitted to your lordship's judgment, After the noble stand you made against Lord Mansfield upon the question of libel, we did expect that you would not have fuffered that matter to have remained undetermined. But it was faid that Lord Chief Justice Wilmot had been prevailed upon to vouch for an opinion of the late Judge Yates, which was supposed to make against you; and we admit of the excuse. When such detestable arts are employed to prejudge a question of right, it might have been imprudent, at that time, to have brought it to a decision. In the present instance you will have no fuch opposition to contend with. If there be a judge, or a lawyer of any note in Westminfter-hall, who shall be daring enough to affirm that, according to the true intendment of the laws of England, a felon, taken with the Maner, in flagranti delisto, is bailable; or that the discretion of an English judge is merely arbitrary, and not governed by rules of law, -I should be glad to be acquainted with him. Whoever he be, I will take care that he shall not give you much trouble. Your lordship's character assures me that you will assume that principal part, which belongs to you, in fupporting the laws of England, against a wicked judge, who makes it the occupation of his life, to misinterpret and pervert them. If you decline this honourable office, I fear it will be faid that, for fome months past, you have kept too much company with the Duke of Grafton. When the contest turns upon the interpretation of the laws, you cannot, without a formal furrender of all your reputation, yield the post of honour even to Lord Chatham. Considering the fituation and abilities of Lord Mansfield, I do not scruple to affirm, with the most folemn appeal peal to God for my fincerity, that, in my judgment, he is the very worst and most dangerous man in the kingdom. Thus far I have done my duty in endeavouring to bring him to punishment. But mine is an inferior, ministerial office in the temple of justice.—I have bound the victim, and dragged him to the altar.

JUNIUS.

THE Reverend Mr. John Horne having with his usual veracity and honest industry, circulated a report that Junius, in a letter to the Supporters of the Bill of Rights, had warmly declared himself in favour of long parliaments and rotten boroughs, it is thought necessary to submit to the public the following extract from his letter to John Wilkes, Esq.; dated 7th of September 1771, and laid before the society on the 24th of the same month.

"WITH regard to the several articles, taken 66 feparately, I own I am concerned to fee that the " great condition, which ought to be the fine qua " non of parliamentary qualification, - which ought " to be the basis (as it affuredly will be the only " fupport) of every barrier raised in defence of the " constitution, I mean a declaration upon oath to " sborten the duration of parliaments, is reduced to of the fourth rank in the esteem of the society; " and, even in that place, far from being infifted on with firmness and vehemence, seems to have " been particularly flighted in the expression. - You 66 shall endeavour to restore annual parliaments!-" Are these the terms, which men, who are in er earnest, make use of, when the salus reipublica. " is at stake?-I expected other language from " Mr. Wilkes .- Besides my objection in point of. ee form,

" form, I disapprove highly of the meaning of the fourth article as it stands. Whenever the quef-" tion shall be seriously agitated, I will endeavour " (and if I live will affuredly attempt it) to con-" vince the English nation, by arguments to my " understanding unanswerable, that they ought to " infift upon a triennial, and banish the idea of an " annual parliament. I am convinced that, if shortening the duration of par-" liaments (which in effect is keeping the repre-" fentative under the rod of the constituent) be " not made the basis of our new parliamentary ju-" risprudence, other checks or improvements fig-" nify nothing. On the contrary, if this be made " the foundation, other measures may come in " aid, and, as auxiliaries, be of confiderable ad-" vantage. Lord Chatham's project, for inflance, " of increasing the number of knights of thires, " appears to me admirable. As to cut-" ting away the rotten boroughs, I am as much offended as any man at feeing fo many of them under the direct influence of the crown, or at " the disposal of private persons, Yet, I own, "I have both doubts and apprehensions, in regard " to the remedy you propole. I shall be charged " perhaps with an unufual want of political intrè-" pidity, when I honefly confess to you, that I am " startled at the idea of so extensive an amputa-" tion .- In the first place, I question the power, " de jure, of the legislature to disfrançaise a num-" ber of boroughs, upon the general ground of " improving the constitution. There cannot be " a doc-

" a doctrine more fatal to the liberty and property " we are contending for, than that, which con-" founds the idea of a supreme and an arbitrary " legislature. I need not point out to you the fa-" tal purpofes, to which it has been, and may be " applied. If we are fincere in the political creed " we profess, there are many things, which we " ought to affirm, cannot be done by King, Lords " and Commons. Among these I reckon the dil-" franchifing of boroughs with a general view of " improvement. I consider it as equivalent to rob-" bing the parties concerned of their freehold, a " their birth-right. I fay that, although this 66 birth-right may be forfeited, or the exercise of " it suspended in particular cases, it cannot be ri-"ken away, by a general law, for any real or pretended purpose of improving the constitution. " Supposing the attempt made, I am persuades " you cannot mean that either King, or Lords " should take an active part in it. A bill, which " only touches the representation of the people, " must originate in the house of commons. In " the formation and mode of passing it, the exclu-" five right of the commons must be afferted as forupulously, as in the case of a money-bill. Now, Sir, I should be glad to know by what si kind of reasoning it can be proved, that there is " a power vested in the representative to define is his immediate conflituent. From whence could " he possibly derive it? A courtier, I know, will be ready to maintain the affirmative. The doctrine fuits him exactly, because it gives an unimitted operation to the influence of the crown. But we, Mr. Wilkes, ought to hold a different language. It is no answer to me to say, that the bill, when it passes the house of commons, is the act of the majority, and not the representatives of the particular boroughs concerned. If the majority can disfranchise ten boroughs, why not twenty, why not the whole kingdom? Why should they not make their own seats in parliment for life?—When the septennial act passed the legislature, did what, apparently and palpably, they had no power to do; but they did more than people in general were aware of: they, in effect, disfranchised the whole kingdom for four years.

66 limitted

" For argument's fake, I will now suppose, that the expediency of the measure, and the of power of parliament are unquestionable. Still von will find an infurmountable difficulty in the " execution. When all your inftruments of amputation are prepared, when the unhappy pa-" tient lies bound at your feet, without the possibility of refiftance, by what intallible role will " you direct the operation? - When you propose " to cut away the rotten parts, can you tell us what parts are perfectly found?-Are there any certain limits, in fact or theory, to inform you " at what point you must stop, at what point the " mortification ends. To a man to capable of ob-" fervation and reflection as you are, it is unnees cellary to fay all that might be faid upon the " ubject. Belides that I approve highly of Lord

- " Chatham's idea of infusing a portion of new health
- " into the constitution to enable it to bear its infirmi-
- " ties, (a brilliant expression, and full of intrin-
- " fic wisdom) other reasons concur in persuading
- " me to adopt it. I have no objection, &c."

THE man who fairly and completely answers this argument, shall have my thanks and my applause. My heart is already with him. - I am ready to be converted. - I admire his morality, and would gladly subscribe to the articles of his faith .--Grateful, as I am, to the GOOD BEING, whose bounty has imparted to me this reasoning intellect. whatever it is, I hold myfelf proportionably indebted to him, from whose enlightened understanding another ray of knowledge communicates to mine. But neither should I think the most exalted faculties of the human mind, a gift worthy of the divinity; nor any affiftance, in the improvement of them, a subject of gratitude to my fellow creature, if I were not fatisfied, that really to inform the understanding corrects and enlarges the heart.

JUNIUS,

Orbitary Former Derice . 1111 ace of wood falls Tryal . .. VIII Blackiston on Law of Sarland. 95 Bioford Duk lost his Son. 1.119 -... Cast in Chancery .. 1.120 Defeated at Bedford . 1 120 Horsewhiped a Litchfield 121 Desires to Berseathed ... 1. 122 gove the K the Sye ... 123 Sold his Sons Close ... 1.147 Bute's charge ay Bedford .. 1. 119 Iducation of y. Hing. 2. 22 Pof Wales Household 2 12 Bradshaw's Censon ... 2. 16 Burgoyne 20500 - 2 16 Brentford Election . 1 43 Bingleys Commitment 2. 85

Declaration for Junius . 2 200 Dowager in the Regency 2 123 ---- Her Conduct . 2.22 Draper Solom for Bed ford 1 133 Opinion of Ministers 137 own VinDication. 1. 24 His annute ... 1 33 Education of y King . 2. 22 Cyris Backquestioned 2 217 Falkland Wland . . . 2. 97 Granby's Conduct questonot 9 Gandelyeneral accosted 2 2 Grafton Secretary. 1. 4 ... turns of Ann Garron 53 ... Solda Place to Nine 2 20 Hines Sattent - - - 2 40

Hawhe low 2 46 A. Come: admit no appeal 2 118 Hornelo Junius . . . 2 138 ... Calling for Proofs 2 144 his farewell ... ? 172 Junius on Granby londuct 1 1 on do lo lom Draper 1 18 10 fo wom Draper .. 1.31 to De taking leaves 1. 35 Streetures on him 1. 138 Junius tografton Dute-138 to d. Brentford Elect 43 on Lutterals theel? 1.49 uniting with Rochinghom 54 attacherd to Bute 1.70

· Junius to Grafton - 1 on Jam Claugh in 12 14 on Breach of Free12 14 ... - quit adminstr 2 40 ... - appointed freez led 2 120 Robinson Letter. 2.133 ... Whittlebury Forresta 174 Lutteral Farmily 2 212 Juneus to the King 2 24 Lucisias on Bemonstranens 200 Junius to Dow. Weston 1 47 Junius on Prev: of Part: 171 unius to D.Blackston 1.95 ... on Blacks for portar 102 ... on some passages 1 111 Junior 10 2:03 . 0 ford. 1 116 - . . . dady Tavistoch 1 143

amius on Gen. Gancel. 2/ on City adrefses - - 2 56 en Prorogative ... 2 64 10 Lord North - 277 10 Lord Mansfield. 280 on Lyres Bail ... 2 211 10 Impeach Mansfield 2 212 2° on Eyres Bail - 2 217 on Falhland Island 2 93 ... Priv: of Parliam 2 106 Junius to Horne ... 2 141 · -- answer to Horne 2 190 toy Livery of Lond ? 181 Oliview of Charaters 2 184 Junius to Lord Camben 2. 240 Junius on D' Blackston 1 87 Countery Boxougho 2 248 Juries give Gen! Virdel 1 V Hing Friends . - - 275 Zing on Death of Gorh 2 6! Liberty of the Orefs - 1.111 Lungal's advarteem - 278 Leigh Defends Momsfields 92 Musgrave Dr ___ 270 Marts fell Opinion Level 2 90 Mansfield Conduct Expland 205 North made Mirister. 2 49 Nero fiddled . - - 256 Norton S. Flescher . 2 68 Norton's Diclaration . 1 51 Shilo Sunius onlyrafton 163 Thilo Junius on Do 166

Filo Junius on Law of Part 1 83 - on Incapacity - 1 112 10 Modestus . -1 144 onljen Gancel 2 8 10 Deplaining - 2 119 . - - on King Jonnes 2. 2 120 on Commitment 2 123 Law of Parliam. 2 124 · 10 Splain y - - 2.170 Camdens Character 195 -- to Lino on Mans 12 198 on Grefs Warants. 2 204 10 Anti Junius 2 103 Postserepl Blackutons 1.95 Origby Cudgled - - - +121 Robinson's Letter --- 2 133 Surgeons Ployal Inquest 1 40
Tavistock Lady's Generafely, 147
Vong born his lase - 2 19
Woodfalls Tryall dee of, xin
Walfaston Leggeld & 1 112
Walfole Committed 1. 113
Whittlebury Forrest 2 174
Wilkes not allend 9 H. 6: 115

